Henry VIII. took up his functions as Supreme Head of the Church and Clergy of England with great seriousness. In his theory, this was no new departure; he connected it, now with the claim that the Monarchy of England had always been of the nature of empire, and now with the consecration that accompanied coronation. When he put his power into commission, Thomas Cromwell was his Vicar-General; he devolved upon him the visitatorial powers of the Supreme Head—i.e., a jurisdiction superior to that of archbishops and bishops. He regarded these dignitaries as the most aggressive of the popes had affected to regard them. They were persons upon whom the Œcumenical bishop devolved a partem sollicitudinis, a share of the anxiety which was truly all his own. The mind of Henry in the matter is clearly seen in the licence whereby Bonner was appointed Bishop of London, which devolved upon him certain functions from the Supreme Head during its own good pleasure. This same theory holds in the time of Edward VI.; the young king is spoken of in this style: "Supreme Head on earth of the Church of England and Ireland, from whose kingly power all authority of decision and jurisdiction of every sort, as well ecclesiastical as secular, flows as from a supreme head, the fount and origin of all official functions within our kingdom." This language occurs in a commission addressed to Cranmer, and by it he is allowed to continue to exercise the jurisdiction of his primacy; "the royal munificence," it says, "inclining an ear to his humble supplication, indulgently recognises his precarious position," and renews his licence.

After the Roman-Spanish rule of Mary, the supremacy was invested in Elizabeth as Supreme Governor, not Supreme Head, but by an Act which revived the powers of the Supreme Head Act of Henry VIII., with the addition of a reserve of power to the Crown, and unlimited powers of visiting, reforming, correcting and amending, which might be (and were) devolved, not to a Vicar-General, but to a High Commission Court. The "reserve of power to the Crown" not only kept all initiative in the Queen's hands, but it enabled her to paralyse the efforts of bishops and Parliament alike. She stayed for nine years the issue of the Articles of Religion to the Church, because she "would not suffer these things to be ordered" by Convocation or by Parliament, on the ground that they belonged to "Her Majesty's Royal authority of supremacy of the Church of England." She legislated for the Church by Injunctions, which the bishops were to enforce. Many of them, old Marian exiles like Jewel and Pilkington, deplored their own helplessness. They wanted to evangelise the country, like Latimer in the days of Edward VI. What the queen wanted was external uniformity, as little preaching as possible, and laissez-faire. I must not pause to debate the question how far she was justified by political considerations. I would only point out that all the types and forms of early nonconformity were determined by the throttling of the life of the Church by the State, the shutting down of regulation upon every surviving impulse of the spirit of the Reformation. In the early years of Elizabeth's reign, the policy of uniformity and no options led to the Vestiarian Controversy. Certain ministers scrupled the surplice and called it a "conjuring garment of the Pope's church." The bishops admitted that the wearing of this vestment or that was a thing in itself indifferent: God neither commands it nor forbids it. "Then why enforce it?" said thirty-seven London ministers who were in prison for noncompliance: "What authority can make necessary that which Christ has not made necessary in his Church?" The bishops did not relish the answer they had to give. "The zone of things neutral and in themselves indifferent is the scene of the ecclesiastical legislation of the Protestant State. All such right of action is, in this country, vested in the Queen; she can at will enforce a thing, and then it is taken, in the view of a loyal subject, out of the category of things indifferent." "Nay," said the ministers, "no earthly power can alter the nature of things which God hath not commanded nor forbidden." Out of this emerged the first permanent principle of historical English nonconformity.

The party of further reformation was not content to be idle; if the bishops would not lead them, they would do something to make the Church a living thing in their own parishes. If the impulse did not come from the top, still a foundation should be laid at the bottom for a National Church according to the scriptural model, as they conceived it. Hence the movement in the direction of what Robert Brown afterwards called "Reformation without tarrying for any." The first aim was to set up a "godly discipline" in each parish, and the main part of the organisation for this purpose was the association of Elders with the minister to form a parochial presbytery, such as survived in the Kirk session of a Scottish parish. The plan was not novel. It was one special way in which the Reformed Churches of the Continent had wrested from the State some power of social and moral jurisdiction. Not without many a struggle; for the Reformed State claimed to say who did or who did not belong to the Reformed Church; it admitted to, or excluded from, Communion. Calvin fought for years against the right of the Council of Geneva to order the administration of the Sacrament to whomsoever it pleased. Unless we understand the meaning of this claim of the Church to moral jurisdiction—its desire to deal with the scandalous and the impenitent within its own circle—we shall misjudge the whole Disciplinarian movement and its extreme form in the Separatist Churches. Discipline was an admitted necessity for a Reformed Church that was to be something more than an appanage of the State. The first Puritans caught holding a conventicle (Plumbers' Hall, 1567), deplored that "no discipline, according to the word of God, was brought into the Church" by the Edwardian reformers. The Edwardian reformers had already deplored it, and the Church of England goes on deploring it every Lent unto this day. Every Ash Wednesday it repeats their words written in 1549, "Brethren, in the Primitive Church there was a godly discipline" . . "until the said discipline may be restored again, which is much to be wished": so we read in the Commination (where, however, the particular discipline referred to is only penitential).

Though many of the clergy were credited with the intention to "erect up their several presbyteries in their own parishes," I do not know that such a presbytery was ever formally constituted except in the case of Wandsworth in 1572. But the literature in which the principle of parochial presbyteries is set forth and defended, stamped the whole party with the names of Disciplinarian Puritans, Presbyterians, or "the Consistorian faction." The writings of Cartwright especially are noteworthy as enforcing that appeal to Scripture as final and positive law which was to be essentially characteristic of Puritanism. He pushed his argument against all subsidiary authorities and all consideration of usage or expediency in Church matters, to the point of denying the existence of any neutral zone and any things indifferent in religious observance. The Bible gives us a Scripture pattern of a Church. All that is not therein prescribed is human invention, and must be rejected; and all that is, if not prescribed, yet mentioned in the New Testament in connection with the Church, is an essential of the Gospel model. Hence the Church must have all the officials named in the Pauline Epistles. The exaggeration of Cartwright's views threw the cause of the self-determination of a living Church and its power to provide for its own exigencies of administration into the hands of his opponents. The side of reasonable liberty was represented by Whitgift, the most unscrupulous and thorough-going of Elizabeth's episcopal instruments, and by Hooker, whose immortal work of "The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity" created the best tradition of the English Church.

But Presbyterianism came to stand for another thing: for a point of doctrine much more operative than the abortive scheme of parochial Elderships; not theological doctrine, for, as an early writer on the Articles tells us, there was no difference between the Conformist and the Nonconformist on any matter of religion until the Puritans put forth their strong Sabbatarian views. Voluntary associations of the clergy for mutual counsel and for the encouragement of preaching had sprung up in many counties. They were favoured by several bishops, and Grindal the Primate saw nothing but good in them. He refused to be the Queen's instrument in suppressing them; but suppressed they were. They were called prophesyings (the New Testament word for preachings). Not till after they were suppressed, when some of the associated clergy continued to meet in a contraband way, was there (as I think) any ground for suspicion that an attempt was being made to hold classical meetings of presbytery. But if the clergy may not meet, if four or five of them may not come together for a special service, the question arises,—Have they no rights? What is a presbyter? Is he only a servant of a Lord Bishop, a person with a devolved charge, and a responsibility to those only who are set over him in the State ecclesiastical? Appeal was made to the New Testament, where the words Bishop and Presbyter or Elder, if not used quite interchangeably, yet occur, it was maintained, in such a way as never to suggest that there was a whole difference of order between them. When St. Peter calls himself an elder, does he mean that he was inferior in order to a primitive bishop? Further, it was contended, if in the second age a bishop had a pre-eminence over associated elders, it was only as primus inter pares. Hence the doctrine of the parity of ministers which began to be preached at Cambridge in 1587-8; hence the doctrine of the Presbyterian Churches of the present day that there are only two orders, those of presbyter and of deacon. This Presbyterian doctrine was immediately met by the enunciation of High Episcopal doctrine from the lips of Bancroft, who maintained that a bishop is in order other than the presbyter; that his office is of divine right, and is of the essence of the Church. This doctrine, very sparsely espoused during the first twenty years succeeding its first appearance, was destined, as you know, to a high and mischievous career during the eventful years 1620-1640. But already in 1604, the year of the Hampton Court Conference, James I. had pronounced against the Presbyterianism of his youth, and taken the Episcopate into some sort of partnership, in his celebrated phrase, "No Bishop, no King!"

The more or less conformable Puritans had never contemplated any step that should place them outside the Church of England. They held to a National Church and to a parochial organisation. If they dreamed of measures for reforming Church government, their main desire was to bring the bishops into association with their clergy, instead of their being, as they seemed then to be, agents of a secular power ruling the Church ab extra. The case was far other with the Separatists, who carried their idea of reformation "without tarrying for any" a great deal further. They applied to the existing Church the test of the Scripture model, and declared it to be wanting in all the requisites of a true Church. It had neither truly appointed ministers, nor a truly gathered and covenanted people. Its congregations were a mixed multitude, not a communion of saints. Its clergy were appointed by outsiders, not called by the Church out of its own fellowship. Every true Church, on the contrary, is a Church planted and gathered. The particular Church, not a National Church or an association of Churches, is the Church of the New Testament. It inherits the promises; it is, in its measure, the body of Christ. Its members, united by a mutual covenant, are members one of another, and with them rests the power of admission and exclusion. They must keep a watchful eye, and purge the Lord's vine of all dead and unfruitful branches. Hence the perpetual reiteration in Separatists' literature of that early claim of the Reformed Churches to the right of excommunication. The Separatist, the Independent, and later the Baptist, demanded nothing of the State but liberty for the like-minded to constitute themselves by covenant into a Gospel Church. The Presbyterian clung to the idea of a National Church, with a hierarchy after a more primitive model, and such local organisation as should make the particular Church co-extensive with the parish. Hence we see why the Independent was, in the later time, content with Toleration; and why the Presbyterian complained of being made a Separatist against his will, and clamoured for Comprehension.

One generation takes us to the England of the Long Parliament. I am not going to dwell on the conditions of the Church under the rule of Laud, or trace that spread of high sacerdotalism in conjunction of Arminian doctrine which almost totally transformed the character of the Establishment. But I must note that under the mild rule of Laud's predecessor, Archbishop Abbott, there was a preparation in many quarters for the state of things which meets us under the Commonwealth. Many clergymen who scrupled entire conformity were engaged as lecturers in parish churches, sometimes by arrangement with a non-preaching incumbent, sometimes by corporations or by trustees. Weekly lectures were carried on (much like the public part of the old prophesyings) by the co-operation of ministers of a particular town or neighbourhood. Thus a number of clergy and laity were kept attached to the Church, but still as a party of reform. Laud and the bishops of his school endeavoured to suppress the lecturers, insisting that no one should preach who had not, before doing so, read the whole of the Church service, robed in a surplice. And further, during the same period there must have been many efforts at applying existing theories to existing circumstances. John Robinson's Church, which went to Leiden and thence to America (the Church of the Pilgrim Fathers) was a gathered Church within the parish congregation of Scrooby; and I surmise that John Cotton had a "Presbyterated" Church at Boston, Lincolnshire, whence, through him, Boston, Mass., derived its name.

The "Thorough" policy of personal rule in Church and State brought both to the ground at the feet of the Long Parliament. Laud, who would always rather fight than not, defiantly nailed his colours to the mast in the Canons of 1640, which exasperated the Commons and made Baxter a Nonconformist. Anglican writers often speak as if the Parliament had met in a heat of revengeful passion, and at once proceeded to destroy the Episcopate in the interests of Presbytery. I believe the Presbyterian clergy had no expectation at all of the extreme measures which were to ensue, and certainly there had not been any propaganda in favour of a Presbyterian Establishment. Before the abolition of the Episcopate was determined (September, 1642) the future management of the Church had been matter of much discussion in both Houses. The Commons discussed the plan of administering the Church by a lay commission for each county. The Lords debated a scheme—which would have satisfied the English Presbyterian then, as it might have done twenty years later—that of a reduced Episcopacy, and the association of ministers with the bishop in a standing committee for the diocese. This scheme, known as Archbishop Ussher's, was supported by Archbishop Williams of York. How probable it is that such a scheme might have been carried, how improbable it is that there was an organised Presbyterian or other party that would have opposed it, is obvious from the language of Sir E. Dering. "Mr. Speaker, there is a certain new-born, unseen, ignorant, dangerous, desperate way of Independency. Are we for this Independent way? Nay, Sir. Are we for the elder brother of it—the Presbyterial form? I have not yet heard any one gentleman within these walls stand up and assert his thoughts for either of these ways."

When war broke out, the tide ran hard against Parliament. It appealed to the Scots for help and they made their own terms, including union in the League and Covenant, uniformity of Church government in the two countries, and abolition of the Episcopate. The members of both Houses took the Covenant; the Westminster Assembly of Divines was called from its work of revising the thirty-nine Articles, to draw up a Presbyterian scheme for England, and a directory of worship. The Scottish army entered England, and the result was Marston Moor. But nobody in England was in a hurry to carry out the ecclesiastical side of the compact. Nobody cared for Presbyterial Church government; it had the worst of faults, it was un-English. The Dissenting Brethren (the five Independents in the Westminster Assembly) fought every detail in the scheme, and Parliament fenced with every plea of urgency put forth by the Scottish Commissioners. In 1645-6 a good number of English counties were mapped out into classical Presbyteries, but I doubt if the organisation ever got into complete working order, save in London and Lancashire, and, perhaps, Shropshire and Essex. In many other cases we have the names of parishes and ministers arranged according to districts and classes, but no record of any activity, except, perhaps, an ordination. London, which had been thoroughly indoctrinated by the Scottish clerical Commissioners, was the seat of High Presbyterian doctrine, running to the length of the Jus Divinum of Presbytery, and the demand (of which we have noticed the significance) that the State should grant to the ministry the power of excommunication. But Parliament was still indifferent. It had checked any overweening assumption on the part of ministers by giving a great preponderance in numbers to the lay Elders in every classis; and it left the Presbyterian structure without its culmination in a General Assembly, by making itself the court of final appeal from the subaltern bodies. The impression one gets from reading the extant minutes of the classis is this: that there is some wholesome moral discipline exercised and some ecclesiastical propriety enforced; that the ministers were afraid to attempt much without the support of their lay Elders; that the laymen attended very badly; and from them the doubt spreads to the ministers, whether it is worth while to carry the thing any further. London and Lancashire went doggedly on to the eve of the Restoration; but in other places the classis dwindled away, or gave place in time to a better thing. And this better thing was the Voluntary Association of Ministers, of which Baxter and his neighbours set the pattern in the Worcestershire Agreement of 1653. These Associations were of ministers only, much on the model of the Prophesyings. The associated ministers were at liberty to organise their own parishes as they would, but the brother of the Congregational way was told by Baxter that if he would have a gathered Church, he must gather it from his own parish and not from his neighbours'. Many other counties put forth similar agreements, exhibiting however some differences in detail—e.g., the profession of faith of Cumberland and Westmorland is highly Calvinistic, while that of Worcestershire has no Calvinism in it. Both are supposed to be only detailed paraphrases of the Apostles' Creed. In one place you have a church which has a close mutual Covenant and actually re-baptises those admitted to membership (and this not a Baptist Church); in another you have only a promise to submit to the teaching and guidance of the minister, and on his approval the member is introduced into the Church. It must be remembered that the associated ministers were a State clergy. It is certain that in spite of differences there was a brief period of harmony and good understanding. Colonel John Gorges writes to Henry Cromwell in 1657, saying that the associated ministers of Somerset are joined in so firm a bond of union that "the names of Presbyterian or Independent are not mentioned here."

I suppose it was on practical experience of the Associations, combined with his inspiring notion of the broad communion of a universal Church, that Baxter based his idea of Comprehension—agreement in a few essentials, and permitted diversities of operations, which will manifest more and more the working of the same spirit, as they deserve the increase which it can give, and thus lead from personal conviction to Catholic communion. The Scots had been against tolerating Independents in this country at all; they retorted on the pleadings of Nye and his fellows by asking whether their plea for Toleration extended to the Baptists; and, according to Baillie, they could never get a straight answer. The simplest and most thorough-going statements as to Toleration at this time come from no ecclesiastical source, but from the "new model army"; which, while protesting that it seeks not to overthrow Presbyterianism, demands that "such who, upon conscientious grounds, may differ from the established forms may not for that be debarred from the common rights, liberties, or benefits belonging equally to all as men and members of the Commonwealth while they live soberly, honestly, and inoffensively towards others, and peacefully and truthfully towards the State." But the Army had some reason to be annoyed with the high-handed Presbyterians of London, and, moreover, it was raising in its midst a large crop of "gifted brethren," who were thorns in the sides of settled ministers. In the eyes of the "Grace-taught" soldier, as in those of George Fox, the incumbent of the steeple-house was but a priest and a cumberer of the ground. The clergy were frightened by awful tales of the heresies and blasphemies of Ranters, Levellers, and Quakers, and denounced them in County Attestations. They had just the same anxiety as Luther had about the Anabaptists, and wondered if a measure of freedom must always be a disclosure of Protestant disunion. Under these circumstances the associated ministers grew closer together towards the end of the Commonwealth period. Their differences were more and more obliterated. Many of the Independent leaders had renounced the extremes of Separatism; and the Savoy Declaration of 1658 assured the Presbyterians that their Congregational brethren were not only sound in the faith, but were taking broader views of religious fellowship than their fathers had done. But by this time Cromwell was dead, and all further development was stopped by uncertainty as to the future, and divergence of political views.

Cromwell's own views of toleration had been expressed in the Instrument of Government (1653): "That such as professed faith in God by Jesus Christ (though differing in judgment from the doctrine, worship, or discipline publicly held forth) shall not be restrained from, but shall be protected in, the profession of the faith and exercise of their religion, provided this liberty be not extended to Popery or prelacy, nor to such as, under the profession of Christ, set forth and practise licentiousness." Hereupon, Baxter tells us, the orthodox party said that the words "faith in God by Jesus Christ" should mean nothing less than the fundamentals of religion; and he was appointed a member of a committee of divines to draw up a statement of fundamentals "to be as a test in this toleration." Then follow his often quoted words: "I would have had the brethren to have offered the Parliament the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and Decalogue alone as our essentials or fundamentals; which at least contain all that is necessary to salvation; and hath been taken by all the ancient Churches for the sum of their religion. And whereas they still said "a Socinian or a Papist will subscribe all this," I answered, "Then so much the better and so much the fitter it is to be the matter of our concord." What does this mean? Not that he was indifferent to further points of doctrine, not that he cared nothing for theological refinements; he spent his life among them; but that, as he explains, it is always better to take a man into, than to leave him out of, your religious polity. Begin by making him an outlaw, and you lose all influence over him. Make the essentials such as he can readily admit, or his acceptance of what you impose becomes a mere form which he will probably treat disingenuously. Make them uniform for all, so that there may be no distinction at the outset between him and the man who subscribes more than he, such as would make him a second-class burgher in the Kingdom of God. And there is behind this, Baxter's extraordinary faith in the right-mindedness of man. Start him with correct premisses and he must surely arrive at correct conclusions, especially if he may have the privilege of a few minutes' conversation with Richard Baxter.

Baxter had faith in the practical union of moderate men. He tells us exactly this in speaking of the associated ministers of Worcestershire. After excepting a few Episcopals and Independents who held aloof, he says: "All the rest were mere Catholics, men of no faction, nor siding with any party, but owning that which was good in all as far as they could discern it, and upon a concord in so much, laying out themselves for the great ends of their ministry, the people's edification." I doubt not that a great number of the ejected ministers were such "disengaged faithful men," as he calls them. I think our religious ancestry runs back to those men whom Baxter afterwards defended as the "mere Nonconformists," "those who had addicted themselves to no sect or party at all, though the vulgar called them by the name of Presbyterians. I am loth," he adds, "to call them a party, because they were for Catholicism against parties." How strong in numbers the moderates were, may be gathered from Baxter's estimate that if the Restoration settlement of the Church had been on the lines of Charles II.'s October Declaration passed into law (a scheme of modified episcopacy with some relaxation of subscription), not more than three hundred ministers would have refused to conform. As it was, the restored bishops and a vindictive House of Commons were bent on making such comprehension impossible, and won a mean triumph in the Act of Uniformity. And Baxter was among the first batch of the ejected.

It was with a consistent fidelity to conviction that the men who, like Baxter, held that the terms and conditions of Christianity itself ought to be the terms and conditions of the Church, refused still to consider that the revengeful interference of the State could make the Church of England into a false Church, and thought it right to attend the worship of parish churches, and after 1670, as a further testimony in the same direction, to communicate in the sacrament. The vicar of Mansfield reports "the Presbyterians do frequent the public assembly here" (1669), and among those who did so were five ejected ministers, two of whom became ministers of the High Pavement, Nottingham. Sharpe, when Archbishop of York, recalled the days when he had administered the sacrament to Baxter, who on one occasion knelt to receive it between Sir Roger L'Estrange, who prepared the case against him which brought him to trial before Judge Jeffreys, and Miles Pranse, who was convicted of perjury in the affair of Sir Edmund Bury Godfrey—an extreme illustration, truly, of his own theory of open and Catholic communion. The breadth of view, the refusal to be made sectarian, which prompted the action of Baxter, Manton, Howe and others in this matter, has seldom been understood or appreciated. It was construed to justify the sacramental test. It was used to point the gibe of the Conformist about the sin of Schism—"if it is not sinful to conform in part, it must be sinful not to confirm altogether." It woke up the old Independent testimony against a false Church, and led to a good deal of controversy among the ejected, and a falling back into two camps again. It was one of the cases in which Baxter, to use his own illustration, put his bare hand into a cleft and both sides closed upon it.

When in 1689 the Toleration Act passed, and the Revolution project of comprehension failed, there was on the part of the moderate Nonconformist the same persistent unwillingness to take up a Separatist or Sectarian position. Some chapels had been built in the country during the brief indulgence of 1672; there was in this, to the minds of the patriarchs of "mere nonconformity," a token of too ready foregoing of the Englishman's birthright in his Church. And when it had to be Dissent, licensed and regulated, there was great unwillingness to hold service at the meeting-house during the public time—i.e., the time of service in the parish church. And the moderate Nonconformist went to both. Thoresby, the Leeds antiquary, enumerates his own four forms of worship: the public (Leeds parish church), the private (Mill-hill chapel), the family, and the secret. When we complain sometimes that the meeting-house is like a barn, that it is hidden in a back street, and so forth, we are apt to forget how often the stones were laid with a sigh of disappointment and a hope that no second generation of religious exiles might worship on the spot; how entirely the work of the minister was conceived as lying within the particular society, what careful shrinking there was from anything like competition with the clergy as to public and parochial functions, and from any assumption that the chapel stood for a purer gospel or a profounder piety than the church!

We cannot wonder that the moderate Nonconformist espoused the idea of a Comprehensive Dissent, if he might not belong to a Comprehensive Church. The Heads of Agreement, due mostly to the pen, and to the discretion of John Howe, which were approved in 1681, contained a scheme for revived association. Presbyterian and Independent were again to cease from using these distinctive names; they were alike to be Protestant-Dissenters (the term used in the Toleration Act), and their associated ministers were to be United Brethren. You will consequently find that the trust deeds of chapels for twenty years from this date devote them to "the worship of God by Protestant Dissenters," sometimes followed by such a clause as "that is to say, Presbyterians or Independents"—a fruitful source of trouble. The Presbyterians were under the impression that in these Heads of Agreement they had conceded a great deal to the Congregationals; but many of the Congregationals had the feeling that, having Toleration, they chiefly wanted to apply their own scheme, and were disinclined to any forfeiture of a point of Independency in the interests of an association they did not particularly care about. Within a year, the United Brethren of London were called upon to intervene in a case which revealed a difference of feeling such as no paper concordat could bridge over. An Independent minister in Cambridgeshire held what we should call revival-services, which were followed by hysterical phenomena, then unfamiliar. With the aid of laymen who were "awakening preachers" he carried on missions; he gathered from other churches, and rebaptised those who had received the baptism of the Church of England. So sure was he that that Church is false, or none at all, that any member of his flock who attended a service therein was visited with censure and, if impenitent, with excommunication. Nothing could be more abhorrent than this from the feeling of the Baxterian; and we are prepared to find that, in the subsequent age of the great Evangelical Revival, the Presbyterian and the Independent are on different sides.

The case of the church I have mentioned leads me to say a word about Covenants. This church of Rothwell, or Rowell, was gathered under the Commonwealth, and its original Covenant bound the members to walk according to a large body of Articles selected by their minister from a book by Francis Junius, Professor at Leiden, and to profess them against all error. I mention this merely to show that the Happy Union was somewhat hampered by the fact that nobody could tell beforehand what the terms of membership of an Independent Church might be. Dr. Doddridge is said to have refused to consider an invitation to an important church in London because he apprehended that its Covenant was such as he could not take. Still, it is marvellous how much practical fusion there was in the country, especially as compared with London—due (1) to county associations, which took the Heads of Agreement as their charter; (2) to the recognition therein of "consent and agreement to walk together according to a gospel rule" as a usual condition of membership, with the proviso that different degrees of explicitness in such agreement ought not to prevent churches from owning each other as instituted churches (notice, there is a careful avoidance of all the old fighting terms throughout); (3) to the fact that some Presbyterian Churches adopted such forms of Covenant as justified their Congregational neighbours in owning them and "sitting down with them" (as Oliver Heywood says) under this clause; such Covenants, in so far as I know them, appear to be very much on the lines of that prescribed in the Worcestershire Agreement.

Such, then, was the modus vivendi of those Nonconformist parties whose harmony was seriously endangered, first by the Crispian Controversy, as to High or Low Calvinism, and next by the Salter's Hall Controversy, in which the endeavour seemed to be made to fix upon the Presbyterian the discredit of heresy or indifference as to the doctrine of the Trinity. Of course, all permitted Dissent was subject to the conditions of the Toleration Act: all ministers must sign the doctrinal Articles of the Church of England as a condition of taking out a licence. There had been no outbreak, even, of suspicion, among the Dissenters on this matter, save at Exeter, where the fusion of Presbyterian and Independent in a common cause had seemed most complete. We must not attach too much importance to the victory, if such it can be called, of the Non-Subscribers at Salter's Hall in 1719—as though they had come out upon a conscious principle of religious progressiveness. They resented what they took to be an effort to get a particular "degree of explicitness" imposed as a test of fellowship, and this on a matter of doctrine which had been, within the last few years, treated in a variety of ways, all equally claiming to be Trinitarian and orthodox. And this same temper marks the whole treatment of the doctrine of the Trinity in Presbyterian circles for the next fifty years (1720-1770). There is no fresh start, no working out of a theology from a new central conception of the simple unipersonality of God, or the simple humanity of Christ. But there is continuous resistance of all attempts to make the doctrine of the Trinity more central, more essential, more definite, and more detailed, than it is in Scripture. Moreover, the Arian and Socinian schemes were regarded by their supporters as being nothing but "Scripture doctrines of the Trinity"; and both of these admitted address to Christ in prayer or invocation—while the usage of free-prayer enabled the minister to avoid all violation of his own convictions. But when Lindsey came from the Church, distinctly on the ground that prayer to Christ was "Christian Idolatry," he practically made "Lex orandi, lex credendi" the motto of a new departure. Yet surely the spirits of some of our ancestors might complain that we have followed him in raising a doctrine of the ultimate Godhead to "a degree of explicitness" which has sometimes gone beyond our knowledge or our liberality.

The Rev. Walter Lloyd, in opening the discussion, dwelt specially on the subject of our freedom and the source from which it had sprung. Neither the Anglican nor the Presbyterian system under the Long Parliament, he said, had contributed to the development of religious or civil liberty in England, and at the Revolution it was Independency that revived; Presbyterianism knew no resurrection. The Presbyterians practically, in the matter of Church government, came over to Independency. And as to the growth of liberty of thought, the majority always remained orthodox, only the few of more independent mind moved on; that had been the case during last century among the Protestant Dissenters, who had become practically one body of united brethren. The service that morning had begun with a hymn of Milton's, and they had also had a noble address on Dr. Martineau. Those two names ought not to be dissociated. They saw the love of liberty in John Milton, the greatest Englishman that ever lived, and they saw it also in Martineau. He made an important speech in 1838, at an aggregate meeting of Unitarians in London, on "The Right of Free Inquiry," in which he had asked, in reference to a proposed dogmatic statement of belief, "Why drop our anchor here, in seas from which we must be driven, instead of looking out for brighter lands ahead"; and similarly, Milton, in his "Areopagitica," had said that "He who thinks that we are to pitch our tent here, and have attained the utmost prospect," shows that he is far short of the truth. It was to be noted that theological expansion had followed the growth of intellectual liberty. It had been so in the seventeenth century also, and Milton had been influenced not so much by Luther or Calvin, as by the great pioneers of knowledge, such as Bruno and Galileo. Referring to the famous passage in Dr. John Taylor's sermon at the opening of the Octagon Chapel at Norwich, Mr. Lloyd quoted a similar passage in Hartley's "Observations on Man," published some years earlier, in which he spoke of creeds as dying away and giving place to the worship of God in spirit and truth, in which there is neither Papist, Protestant or Calvinist, Trinitarian or Unitarian, Mystic or Methodist, but "We are all Christians, we received this denomination in apostolic times, and ought to seek no other." And, in conclusion, he quoted Dr. Watts (also an Independent): "I cannot make this iron knee bend to a meaner power than Him that made it free."

Mr. S. S. Millin, of the Second congregation of Belfast, spoke of the similar growth of freedom in the Irish Presbyterian Churches, and referred specially to Dr. Kirkpatrick, who early in the eighteenth century had been an ardent upholder of Christian liberty. When the congregation built All Souls' Church, there had been a suggestion to attach the name Unitarian to the church, but he felt that such a step would be a wrong to their noble heritage of liberty, and he had himself moved the resolution that the name should be All Souls.

The Rev. E. I. Fripp said he declined to give up his belief in the Catholicity of Richard Baxter, who was the Newton of liberal religion. The best of his followers had laid stress as Baxter had done on the uniting power of Christian love and prayer. For himself he was weary of the Unitarian controversy, and felt that there were truths much more vital than that of the uni-personality of the Godhead. No self-respecting non-Unitarian could remain a member of a congregation that put the name Unitarian over its doors. They ought not to be content to have a Unitarian Association as their central Ecclesiastical authority, they ought to have a Free Religious Association.

The Rev. J. E. Odgers appealed for the careful preservation and publication of documents connected with the history of Nonconformist Churches, and suggested the formation of a Calamy Society, that might undertake such publications. They wanted light on many historical points in connection with their churches, such as the prevalence of Church Covenants, and he invited those who were interested to communicate with him.

The Conference then adjourned for lunch, after which the chair was taken by Mr. H. P. Greg who, in his opening address, dwelt on the vital importance of the religious education of our children. They were passing through a crisis, a second reformation, for the suppression of clerical domination and the assertion of personal responsibility. Their fathers had fought for religious equality, and had gained it. Now, the fight was for freedom from the materialistic spirit, the military spirit, and the monetary spirit, which engendered indifference to the higher aspirations of mankind. They were the advance guard of a great army, or rather the scouts of that advance guard, whose duty it was to explore the country, that the great army might advance to the Kingdom of God on earth. If the scouts neglected their duty the whole army was delayed. Those who had truly learned to value religion and liberty must at all costs be true, and leave compromise to others. Their object was the Kingdom of God; it must be achieved by walking humbly with God and doing His will. He then called upon the Rev. John Ellis, who read the following paper:—

HOW BEST TO ORGANISE THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF OUR YOUNG PEOPLE.

I am not sure that this title quite accurately describes my present purpose. What I have chiefly in view is, to call attention to the need for some organisation which shall bind our young people more closely together for religious fellowship and helpful service, and hold them in faithful allegiance to our churches. The "how best to organise," if the need be admitted, must of necessity be left to the determination of a Committee, consisting of those whose abilities, sympathies, and experience especially qualify them for so important a duty.

There are abundant signs, in many directions, of the growing recognition of the fact that our churches are not doing all that it is possible for them to do to foster the religious life of the young; or to make the church a congenial religious home for them; or to send them out into the world enthusiasiastic workers for God, for Truth, for Righteousness. Very significant in this connection was a resolution passed by the teachers in council at the Oxford Summer Meeting, which ran as follows:—

"That we, the members here assembled, feel the immense importance of the young people of our congregations and schools being invited to become members of our churches in a definite way. That when we return to our various centres, we will ask our ministers and members of our congregation to take steps without delay to make arrangements for such invitation to our young people into the church; that our church should recognise its responsibility for these young people; and that its members should use every means in their power to make of it a religious home and a field of useful labour for our young people."

Probably some of you were delegates at the Oxford Meeting and have already brought the important matters, mentioned in this resolution, before your respective churches. I hope you have, and to some purpose. But from the nature of the case, it cannot have received that full discussion in the churches as a whole which it well deserves. We could not have a more frank acknowledgment of the consciousness that much remains to be done for the religious culture of the young, after the devoted band of teachers have done their best.

These "teachers in council" say to the churches, in effect, if not in words, "We have done what we could, by personal influence, earnest thought, and anxious care, to instil into the minds and hearts of these little ones the principles of religion and the precepts of the Gospel, to deepen the springs of character and inspire their lives with high aims; now do you, fellow-members of the church, who often from your positions of leisured ease patronise and pity us, take these young people, precious lives we have tried to mould, and receive them into a religious home congenial to them—into the body of the living church." Can you resist such an earnest appeal?

Note the significant change that is coming over the minds of our school-workers. They seem at last to have been touched with a finer spirit. Hitherto, the discussions at our Sunday-school conferences have turned on the question how to retain our scholars in the Sunday-school; and the remedy for the failure suggested has generally been to provide more varied opportunities for social intercourse. We have provided all sorts of amusements and recreative agencies, and still have done little to stop the leakage.

Now, whilst allowing amusements their proper place in a healthy life, we are coming more and more to see the importance of subordinating these to the main objects of the church and the Sunday-school, and to recognise that the work of the Sunday-school must be completed in the church. And the problem now is, how, at the earliest moment, to transfer the young people to the church, and enlist their energy and enthusiasm with the agency of the church for the advancement of the Kingdom of God.

We are bound to acknowledge, sooner or later, that there comes a time—even in our Lancashire and Yorkshire and Welsh Sunday-schools—when the youths and maidens, the young men and women, discard the condition of pupilage; when the methods of the school lose their attractiveness for them; when they have an ardent desire to live their own life. It is at this period, when young people are most susceptible to impressions, that we find such a tremendous leakage. The school has ceased to attract them. They have not yet realised the value of worship. The staid respectable formality of the church service fails to win them. Often they get a cool reception by the older members of the religious community to which they belong. They are thought to be too inexperienced to take an active part with their seniors, in spreading the light of truth and the glow of a good life. And so they lapse. They either connect themselves with other religious bodies, where they feel the fervour of devotion, or go to swell the ranks of the mediocre and commonplace. They go out, for the most part, into the world, not even undergraduates in the school of religion—the better for their school days, no doubt—respectable members of society—but without the enthusiasm of religion.

If I have described the situation fairly, you will be ready to admit that there is greatly wanted some organisation to meet the needs of the young people in this transition period—something which shall be not exactly school and not exactly church, possibly a combination of both—through which an earnest endeavour shall be made to deepen the religious consciousness; to cultivate the feeling of reverence; to provide an avenue for generous and unselfish activities—a bridge connecting school and church, over which the young can pass with natural ease and safety.

Perhaps, if I relate my own experience as I faced these considerations it will be helpful in the discussion. With the inspiration of the last conference strong within me, I fell to thinking how I could best direct my energies to increase the vitality of my church. We were well organised in many respects. In addition to the regular services and Sunday-school sessions we had an Adult Class, Literary and Social Union, Band of Hope, Sick and Provident Society, Mothers' Meeting, Ladies' Sewing Society, Dramatic Society, Holiday Fund, and recreative clubs. But there was lacking with all this that strong attachment, on the part of the young, to the church in its main purpose.

After anxious pondering over the matter I resolved to invite a few of the young men to my house to confer with them on the subject. Ten of us met. These young fellows did not know what I had in mind. We talked freely about the religious consciousness, the efficacy of prayer, the Unitarian's idea of God, the aims and objects of the church. Two of the ten had come over to us from the Methodist body; one, who had been a Wesleyan, was disposed to reverent Agnosticism; another was an ardent Socialist; the rest had passed through all the classes of our Sunday-school. I wanted to know how we could help each other to a more vital religion. Those who had been reared in Wesleyanism confessed to the feeling of a lack of close fellowship in the religious life. They missed the self-expression and mutual encouragement which they had before experienced; and those who had been constant companions in our own Sunday-school, much to my surprise, expressed the same view. One and all said how good it was to have had such a frank and friendly talk about these deep things, as we had that evening. They hoped we should meet together again in such a way, for they felt that barriers had been broken down, and they had come nearer to each other than ever they had done before. They agreed to form themselves into a Society for Religious Fellowship and the Cultivation of the Higher Life.

It was at this point that I came into connection with the Young People's Religious Union of America. I had read of the Lend-a-Hand Clubs, the Ten times One Clubs, the Look-up Legions, which had come into being through Dr. Hale's influence; and I knew from the Christian Register that the Young People's Religious Union was a federation of these. I wrote for information. The secretary sent me a copy of their liturgical services and a list of topics arranged for the year. This was just what we needed. We decided to organise on the lines of the Young People's Religious Union, and to hold weekly meetings for which members themselves should be responsible. When all was ready I announced from the pulpit that on a certain evening we should meet to inaugurate our Society, and cordially invited all above fifteen years of age who desired to unite for religious fellowship and the cultivation of the higher life to attend. We started with twenty-five members. I emphasised the importance of considering this their own meeting to be conducted by themselves. Of course I should attend as often as I could to add my word, but only as one of them. The meetings must be of a distinctly religious character. The topics chosen must have some bearing upon religious truth, or the formation of character, or social service, and be conducted, not in the manner of the debating society, but with a view to deepening the religious consciousness, or stimulating each other to high and noble purposes. You see it was to no flowery path for fleeting pleasure and social enjoyment to which I called them. The bond was to be the God-consciousness and the desire to be of service to others. Lest you should conclude that such an institution is calculated to turn out religious prigs, let me assure you that these young folks, on other evenings, enjoy the papers and discussions at our Literary and Social Union, occasional dances and concerts, and out-door sports, quite as intensely as anyone else. But they have kept this one evening for religious exercises and mutual edification, and the encouragement of each other to good endeavour, as sacredly as we keep the services of the church to a similar purpose.

We have met on Thursday evenings with very few exceptions, winter and summer, for now two and a-half years. A different member at each meeting undertakes to announce the hymns, lead in a responsive liturgy, occasionally to provide quotations bearing upon the topic under consideration for the younger members to read, direct the conversation, read the prayers and sometimes offer extempore prayer. Other members in turn undertake to speak or read a paper on a prearranged topic, and all are expected to take some part in the proceedings. "In the love of truth, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man, and, as his followers, we accept the religion of Jesus which is summed up in love to God and love to man."

The topics chosen are in accordance with our high aims, and oftentimes, the way in which the young men and women, boys and girls, deal with these, which sometimes would seem to be quite away from their habitual thinking, has been to me a revelation of the latent power for good in our young folks that we too commonly allow to remain undeveloped and unused. We meet for the study of truth, for the cultivation of worship, for encouragement in service. The two first objects have succeeded beyond measure in increasing devotion and attachment to the highest things. The natural fruitage of our efforts in this direction was to be able to present about twenty members, at a service for self-consecration at the beginning of the year, who were welcomed into the fellowship of the church, and who promised heartily to undertake the responsibilities and duties attaching to church membership. Without our Y.P.R.U. it is extremely doubtful whether such a result could have been achieved. To carry out the object of encouraging each other in helpful service we have several committees. A look-out committee, the members of which are expected to introduce new members, and look up absentees; a flower committee, to provide flowers for the table, and after the meetings to take them to the homes of the sick whenever we know of any; a missionary committee, to distribute the Church Calendar and Unitarian literature in their respective neighbourhoods. We find Union members active in service as teachers, at Band of Hope meetings, in the choir, and in ways of usefulness in all our institutions. We have now under consideration plans for brightening and helping the lives of the poor and neglected.

Such is a brief sketch of the origin and work of our own organisation for the young people. I cannot stop to describe at length how it has helped to deepen the religious life of its members, and to make religion a far more living and real thing to them; nor how it has given them a valuable training in conducting religious meetings and expressing their religious thoughts before others; nor how it has deepened their interest in the church, and helped to bring them into the church as active co-workers; nor how it has given them an increased appreciation of our own Unitarian faith, not only on its side of reasonableness and truth, but also on its side of spiritual quickening and practical value in life. But I can confidently say it has done all this abundantly.

Now, when one is asked to say "how best to organise the religious life of our young people," one is naturally disposed to advocate what one has oneself found to be successful. In other churches with other needs different methods from those of the organisation known as the Y.P.R.U. may be necessary. But the Y.P.R.U. idea has this to recommend it, that it is organised on the lines of the Christian Endeavour Society, which is such a phenomenal success in the Nonconformist churches throughout the world. When you have made allowances for all the cant and hypocrisy and morbid self-introspection often laid to the charge of these societies, you must admit that it means a vast uplift to humanity to have the moral and religious energy of over 3,000,000 young folks directed to good endeavour. From this great movement, as from other great movements, we must perforce stand apart. But there is no reason why we should not adopt what is good in their methods, and adapt them to serve our own needs.

The organisation of the Y.P.R.U., with its weekly meetings, its religious tone, its set purpose to stimulate the young to live a good life, and to indicate ways to activity in human uplifting, appeals strongly to those whom we wish to influence.

Whether we adopt this scheme or not, I hope this Conference will not close before placing on record its recommendation to the churches to seriously consider some plan which will bring our young people, throughout the country, into closer touch with each other. I think we are about ready for this movement. Anyhow, I venture to predict that the World's Convention of Christian Endeavourers, shortly to be held in London, will arouse us to the discernment of our shortcomings in this matter. What leads me to think we are about ready for this movement? Why, the sympathetic response to a circular issued to our ministers a short time ago, asking what was especially being done to bind the young people in religious fellowship in their respective localities. Already I find in many of our churches up and down the country flourishing societies with a common aim and purpose. There are Church and School Guilds, Guilds of Kindness, of Charity, of Temperance, of the Good Samaritan, of the Good Shepherd—the titles of which sufficiently indicate their object—with manuals setting forth their objects in clearly defined terms, hymns, order of service, prayers, and helps for every day.

There are Helper's Unions, Christian Endeavour Societies, Christian Church Societies, Young People's Religious Unions, all on lines similar to the society in connection with my own church. There are week-night Bible classes, week-night services, and ministers' preparation classes, and, perhaps in the majority of our churches there are Sunday afternoon adult classes. The last returns of the Sunday School Association show that there are 8,321 scholars connected with our schools over sixteen years of age—not to speak of the sons and daughters of the wealthier members of the churches and the large army of teachers and other workers not reckoned in these figures. Do not these facts indicate the direction of a most promising forward movement? Let me quote the object of three or four of these guilds, as stated in their manuals, to show you that they are animated with a common purpose. The objects of one of these guilds are:—"To strengthen the religious principles of its members; to stimulate their endeavours to lead good and useful lives; to bind them together in the bond of Christian fellowship; to attach them to and induce them to work for the success and prosperity of their own church and schools." Another declares its object to be:—"To unite in friendly and helpful fellowship the young people of the congregation, the teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school, and any other persons connected with our chapel who may wish to join, and to encourage noble living by kindly services one for another, for the chapel, the Sunday-school, and all whom it may be within our power to serve." Another states its object thus:—"To promote in all its members holiness of life and work for God." And on the front page of the beautiful and helpful "Leicester Great Meeting Guild Manual" the objects are set forth in terms which exactly indicate the kind of organisation I desire to promote in all our churches:—

"The Great Meeting Guild of Fellowship exists for the purpose of uniting more closely members of the congregation and Sunday-school in the deeper things of life.

"We are not enough inclined to speak with each other of the most important part of life. In this guild it is hoped that the members will try to help each other by expressing something of their deeper thoughts and feelings. By monthly meetings at which papers will be read and discussed dealing with our ideals, our duties, and our faith, opportunities for such religious expression will be afforded to all members.

"The guild is further intended to be a religious centre for the various activities connected with the Sunday-school. We have many societies and clubs, each with its own work and aims. The guild will try to unite all such societies together on a religious basis.

"Lastly, the guild will be a body to which the ministers and missionary will look for help in emergencies, as well as in the more ordinary ways of usefulness. The ideal of each member will be to give any help possible to our church and schools, and to strengthen one another for good."

I have taken up four of these manuals as they came first to hand. There is sufficient to show in these that their aims are kindred, and that it would be good for members of such societies to be more closely associated; that it would be an advantage to be connected with a representative body of kindred workers, to which each society could report, and from which it might expect encouragement and help. Such a body of men and women in hearty sympathy with the young people's movement would be ready, through its officers, to convey information where it would be of use; to stimulate activity where there was need for it; and to forward the cause in a variety of ways. It might compile a suitable Hymnal and Liturgy, select a list of suggestive topics, and publish topic helps in our denominational papers. All this, and more, the Young People's Religious Union of America undertakes vigorously.

It seems to me we are in an exactly similar position to that in which our American brethren found themselves a few years ago. There, as here, the churches had made successful attempts to draw their young people together in guilds and clubs in many places. The guild workers felt how much they could help each other and forward the work if they could devise a scheme which should draw them together. They therefore discussed a plan of union at the National Conference of our Unitarian Churches held at Washington five years ago. The outcome of that discussion was the birth of the Young People's Religious Union the following May, with the welcome of the National Conference and the American Unitarian Association. The objects of the Union were then declared to be, and continue to be:—1. To foster the religious life. 2. To bring the young life of our various churches into closer association with one another. 3. To spread rational views of religion, and to put into practice such principles of life and duty as tend to uplift mankind. In the October number of Word and Work last year the secretary is able to write:—

"We have to-day 110 branches, with a membership of between three and four thousand. These branches are naturally, most of them, in New England, though all sections of our country are represented, and there are two societies in England."

"Three years have proved the value of this work, for the young people, to the young people, by the young people. Dispirited churches have been revived, services continued for long seasons in pastorless churches, loyalty to the local church and to the denomination strengthened, and the young people trained in all ways for Christian citizenship. Local unions are left perfectly free and hold services monthly, semi-monthly, or weekly, with local or outside speakers, their own or the national topics.

"Four years old! That is not a great age for an individual, nor is it a long time for a society to have existed. Still we have not done altogether badly in our short life. We came to Washington four years ago, 'nothing but an abstract idea,' as Lamb would say. We come to Washington this fall an organised working body, with over 100 unions as our members. We come to hold a meeting of our own, amid the 'councils of the elders,' to discuss our own relations as young people to the greater body of the church. We come this time glad in the feeling that we, too, are a part of the Unitarian Church, with our own peculiar work to do, and already deemed worthy to bear our bit of the burden."

We followed the example of our American friends in organising this National Conference eighteen years ago, and great benefit has resulted to the churches. Can we not follow them with confidence in this work of organising the young?

It is a union with a similar constitution to that of the Young People's Religious Union of America that I advocate to-day. If it lies within the power of the Conference Committee to formulate and promote a scheme of union, I would urge it to do so. If not, it could at least pass resolutions to this effect:—"That the National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing and kindred congregations, recognising the great need of religious training for our young people, and the great good already accomplished in some of our churches by guilds and other organisations for that purpose, urges upon all of our churches the desirability of trying to start some form of Young People's Religious Societies."

"That the following persons, who are known to have promoted with success organisations on a religious basis for the young people in their respective localities, be appointed a Committee to consider, and, if possible, to draft a scheme of Union of Young People's Societies."

"That this Committee be instructed, when a constitution has been drafted, to address a circular (embodying the draft constitution) to every minister and superintendent of our Sunday-schools, recommending the formation of religious societies suited to the needs of their young people."

"That a meeting, representative of all existing Young People's Religious Societies, be held at Essex Hall in May, 1901, for the purpose of adopting, or otherwise, the constitution recommended."

I should anticipate great good from such an organised effort as is indicated in these resolutions. I believe a large proportion of the young people of our churches and Sunday-schools would respond to a friendly and sympathetic appeal to consecrate themselves to pure and holy endeavours. We have never yet tested their loyalty. In church life as in national life there are qualities only needing the occasion to call them forward. The heart of our nation has been recently stirred by the magnificent spectacle of the response to the calling out of the reserves and volunteers to engage in the cruel and deplorable war now being waged. The call came to put their lives in jeopardy for their country. It reached the workman at his bench, the clerk at his desk, the farmer in his rural home. And they answered the call, and the workman laid aside his tools, the clerk his pen, the peasant his implement, and, one by one, through country lane and city street, after pathetic farewells to those dear ones whom they might never again see on earth, joined the throng of those going to the war, cheered on by the voice of the multitude. Hate war and the causes of war how we may, this was a stirring sight. It revealed a latent patriotism which we little expected.

My brethren, make a strong sympathetic appeal to the young people whom we have striven during their tender years to bring up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, to put their religion to the test, to fulfil its obligations, to follow the ideal, to spend themselves in loving service for the advancement of the Kingdom of God, to unite with the Christian Church in its most sacred objects, and I am very much mistaken if we do not find them ready to respond to the call and to forsake trivial pleasures and pastimes for a nobler work.

Try it, and you will find that what the Christian Endeavour Appeal has done for evangelical orthodoxy, a similar appeal will do for our church life.

Neglect it, and you will neglect a most glorious opportunity for a real Forward Movement for the promotion of the cause of Truth, Religion, and Humanity.

The Rev. John Byles expressed the gratitude they must all feel for the paper, and his sense of the supreme importance of the subject. For himself he increasingly felt that life was the great builder of organisation. If they could get life into the hearts of their young people, they would build up outward activity and character themselves. Christian Endeavour Societies had done a vast amount of good, but they had a weak side. The great need in dealing with the religious life of the young, and of all people, was reality, sincerity. They must dread insincerity, conscious or unconscious. To meet for the avowed object of expressing their feelings, carrying on the process of introspection and then speaking of it, must tend to insincerity. Let them organise their young people, but not to think about themselves, rather for service. That was what Jesus did. "Take up your cross and follow me, nor lay it down till the end is reached." Let them organise, therefore, for service; and of course for service that was religious. He had infinite faith in the religion of children, which they ought tenderly to cherish as a most sacred thing. It must come out of life, which must first be in the hearts of fathers and mothers, ministers and teachers. There was a beautiful little touch in the second part of "Pilgrim's Progress." Christian set out on his journey with a heavy load to carry, and was not rid of it till he had been through the Slough of Despond. But when the boys set off with their mother, Bunyan said: "They fell into tears and cried to go after their father"—no self-consciousness, no big burden, but a father who had gone the right way, and boys who said, "We will go after our father." He commended to them the Harry Wadsworth motto: "Look out and not in; look up and not down; look on and not back, and lend a hand." With such a spirit in their organisation it would be entirely helpful.

Miss Edith Gittins said she preferred the word develop to organise. It covered all, and had God in it. Their great purpose was that the tender plants in the garden of the Lord should grow according to their own proper nature and show forth an individual loveliness. The world's ways changed, and their ways had to change with them. The good old custom of family prayer had succumbed to the haste and pressure of life; but they must not argue from such changes that the spirit of religion was dead. Its life was exercising a wider influence than ever in the hearts where it was found, and they must supply other opportunities for religious culture and expression, out of some such feeling guilds had arisen in connection with their churches. She deprecated the use of single words to designate guilds, as Guilds of Mercy, or Kindness, or Purity; which seemed to limit the scope of Christian duty. They might say: "Is Christ divided? Put on the whole armour of God." In relation to their young people, one beautiful word of Christ's exactly expressed their need and duty: "I call you no more servants, I call you friends." If with reverence and gentleness they could speak so to their young people, their end would be gained.

The Rev. J. T. Sunderland spoke of the great gain to the life of their churches in America the Christian Endeavour Movement had been, and Rev. W. S. Nichols, vice-president of the Young People's Religious Union, delivered the greetings of his Society to the Conference, and expressed his confidence that such a movement would be as successful and helpful in this country as they had found it in America.

The Chairman, having stated that on his suggestion Mr. Ellis was satisfied to leave the resolution he had suggested in the hands of the Conference Committee, called upon Mr. A. H. Worthington to read his paper on:—

THE FUTURE SUPPLY OF OUR MINISTERS.

When your committee did me the honour of asking me to read a short paper at this Conference on the training of our ministers, or some cognate subject, I hesitated about acceding to the request for many reasons; but finding that the invitation was elastic enough to include the subject set down to my name, and profoundly believing that the future supply of the ministry to the congregations represented at this Conference is one of the most vital problems that they have to solve, I took courage and shut my eyes to the many reasons urging the easier course, and made up my mind to offer my mite towards the solution.

Fools step in where angels fear to tread, and I am no angel. Yet I do not fail to see the difficulties in the way of a frank and real Conference on this question. Fully recognising these, and they are patent to all who have seriously considered it, I nevertheless believe that the discussion should be no futile one, and that if we will fearlessly, with open minds, strive to get at the root of the matter, we may do a real service to the congregations of which we are members.

There seem to me two points on which we should fix our attention. Firstly, what manner of man is wanted for our ministry? Secondly, where and how can they be found? First, then, what is wanted? I desire here to record my profound admiration and respect for the main body of our present ministers, and not the least for those who in small chapels, or in isolated districts, surrounded and hampered by a crowd of difficulties and disadvantages—financial, social, and personal—often almost ostracised from the intellectual, social, and religious circles which by right should welcome them, who still have manfully exercised their ministry as only those could who had received a call to the ministry of Christ and faithfully obeyed it. I have in many ways had the privilege of witnessing the splendid and unselfish service of the ministry of our congregations under conditions the hardships and the disappointments of which none know fully but the ministers themselves and He they serve.

Who am I, indeed, I may ask myself, to offer a word of criticism? and my answer is, I do not and I will not. Still may we not all agree that there is much room for improvement, that more toilers in the vineyard are wanted, that the service is one which knows not perfection, and that it behoves us to see if something may not be possible to help in providing more and better equipped servants of the Lord.

I have many near relations and close friends in the ministry, and I am confident that the members of this Conference may in this matter, as in others, strain their eyes for a glimpse of the ideal, and without thought of self, with singleness of aim, endeavour after a nearer and nearer approach to it; and this too, if only the eye be kept on what we are seeking, without offence or wound to any.

What then is wanted? First and foremost men who have received in some measure the Spirit of Christ. This is the call which must come to each one who is to be a true minister, and without which nothing availeth. Next, an educated and cultured ministry. True a prophet is born, not made; and if such be called to our ministry, the education and training given him will, at least, not crush his gift nor prevent him from delivering his message. But we have to do with the rank and file. They surely are heavily handicapped if they are without that all-round education and culture which makes them equally at home in all grades of social and intellectual life. In no calling is this more essential than in the minister's. Will anyone say that, on the whole, a minister so equipped is by virtue of these gifts less qualified even for the poorest chapel or mission? Is the educated clergymen less of a power by reason of his education in the poor country parish, or in the parish in the "East-end" of any great city? Granted that religious zeal and the sympathy born of intimacy are first, trained mental power and knowledge gained only by real and thorough education are a good second. We all have experience, however little our own knowledge or powers, and whatever our social lot, how real and discriminating may be the help of the more highly trained and educated mind. Men and women in all classes will more and more think for themselves; their minds are increasingly day by day reached through literature good and bad, the Press, the club, the school, the society, friends and acquaintances, and in a hundred other ways, by the thoughts and words of other minds. Those who are to lead and guide them to higher things, to protect and to teach them to shield themselves from pernicious and soul-destroying influences, to answer their intellectual doubts, to prove to them the saving power o faith, to teach them righteousness, need to be equipped at all points. Alas! in how many cases may not defects, due to the want of a liberal education, handicap the minister in his work.

There is one more word I want to say as to the kind of men wanted. It must be admitted, I fear, that latterly a smaller and smaller proportion of those entering the ranks of our ministry have come from the families nurtured in the group of congregations in which they are to minister. This ministry must ever be as open and free as our churches, and must ever welcome into its ranks all good and faithful servants of the Lord, who find in it their natural field of work, from whatever communion they come; and how much its power and influence would have been diminished without the vivifying influence of many of those who have entered it from other religious societies, will be realised by a glance through the names on the ministerial roll. But woe to the religious community which does not feel the inspiration of its faith deeply enough to furnish from within the greater proportion of those who are to lead, to guide, and to inspire it, aye, deeply enough to send from the homes of its more cultured families not a few of the flower of their youth, in whom the great truths which have been and are the life-blood of our community are bred in the bone and part of the very marrow of their souls.

To sum up my first point, I submit, nay, confidently assert, that the men wanted are those touched by the spirit which calls them to the work, humbly and devoutly taking the vow to fit themselves to preach the gospel of righteousness, equipped and armed by a wide and deep culture, and largely drawn from the best material in our own community.

Second: Where and how can they be found, and what means are to hand of helping the call to the ministry to reach them. I have heard ministers and laymen speak as if they thought there was no hope, and even no need, of making any move in this direction. My reply to such a view is, I trust, "the retort courteous"; that I "am in the mind that" there is pressing need, and I firmly believe there is high hope, nay, certainty, if we as a community will only grasp some of that faith which removes mountains. If, on the other hand, we care so little for the cause that we are content to "let things take their course"; to take it philosophically if our sons and daughters are untouched by our or any other religious influence; to confess to one another confidentially that the special influence of our community is dwindling and must continue to do so; to say to ourselves and to one another and to let our sons feel, that it is the last thing we should desire to see them enter the ministry now-a-days—then, indeed, there is no hope.

This brings us to the very kernel of the question. Do we, in the bottom of our hearts, believe that there is work in the world for such a ministry, and that there is no nobler, no higher calling than this? If we do, youths will be found to press forward to reach the mark, and to take upon themselves the burden of the service. It is not a question of looking round for likely young men in Sunday-schools, or the offering of cheap and almost free education, nor the raising of salaries and pensions, nor the offering of any other advantages, though all of these in their place and degree may be useful helps. The problem is deeper. We do not try seriously and strenuously enough to strengthen our own and one another's belief in the sacred calling, and to let the sons of our faith feel our belief, so that if they are blessed by the call they may know that all they hold dearest and nearest will help them to cherish the heavenly gift. Let them feel that at home, at school, at college, at worship, they are in an atmosphere of this belief; and, then, in not a few of the purest and ablest of these young lives will the seed be planted and blossom.

How do we know what may be stirring in the young heart ready to leap into life, if only his home, his master, his friend, be ready to respond, and which may be—oh! how easily—crushed if he feels that his yearning will or would, if known, find a cold reception from those he loves, respects, and confides in.

I think our community sadly neglects the religious education of the young. I doubt if there is any religious community in Christendom which leaves the religious education of its youth, and especially of the youth of its more cultivated portion, so entirely to chance as ours, and is more casual in its measures for providing for the succession of its ministry.

What steps to this end are taken at home and in the chapel? What of the schools? Youth is the impressionable time. Youth goes seeking a call for the knightly vow. How far do we ensure that he shall meet with this challenge to knightly service?

I will venture to indicate some ways in which I think more might be done than is done. First, then, look to your children. Truly has it been said that the children of one generation are the trustees of posterity. Every chapel has its Sunday-school for children who are supposed to specially lack religious instruction and influence at home. Are we sure that all those parents in the congregation who do not think of sending their children to the Sunday-school fail to do so, because they are satisfied that religious instruction and influence is sufficiently provided at home?

How many ministers' classes are there to which the more educated members of the congregation send their children? Here parents and ministers must help each other. If both felt the need and combined to meet it throughout our congregations, a great gap in the religious education of our children would be filled up.

Again, take the school life. In the Public and other schools, the boy will constantly be struck with the difference between what he hears in the holidays at home and at chapel, and what is taught at school; or, perhaps, he feels that the school teaching is not what he is supposed to believe in and is merely a matter of form. How easily all religious teaching and influence may become to him a matter of indifference. That our sons may receive deep and lasting religious influence under these conditions, and do so in some cases, must be freely allowed; but, I think, anyone facing the facts must own that indifference is often the result.

If we value the religious influences that have nurtured and guided us, then it behoves us to consider carefully for our sons what the school atmosphere is in this respect. I believe that one of the most vital needs for our community is a great Public school in which the education, physical, mental, and moral, shall be equal to that of the great schools to which our sons are increasingly going, and where, moreover, the religious training shall be on our lines; where our children may feel that they breathe from their teachers and in the school chapel the same religious atmosphere as at home; where the lessons in religion will never be a question of grinding up a number of verses from the Bible, unexplained, or, if explained, yet in a quite different way to what they hear at home; where the school service shall not be partly the repetition of a creed which they know their parents do not believe, or wish them to believe; but where religion shall be taught as they have heard it at their mother's knee and in the family pew.

And such a school we are to have. The far-sighted generosity of the late Philip Barker has founded at Nantwich, near Crewe, in grounds in the heart of a beautiful and healthy district, the Willaston School. Already many other generous friends, and to be followed, I doubt not, by such an army of benefactors as will make Founders' Day at Willaston a memorable red-letter day, are supplementing the original foundation in a way which shows that the need was keenly felt, and that our community, now that the lead has been given, will not turn back till a great school is firmly established fully equipped with teachers, buildings, scholarships be held there, and to lead thence to the Universities and all the other paraphernalia needful, and permeated with the spirit of our congregations. It is a remarkable fact that the same need has been felt among our kindred across the sea, and an inspiriting coincidence that the same year which sees the foundation of our school here marks the birth of her twin sister there. I see that later in the proceedings of this Conference a resolution commemorating James Martineau is to be moved. I trust that in this connection grave consideration may be given to a suggestion that, as a memorial, a fund be raised for scholarships to be held by ministers' sons at Willaston. If from among the succeeding generations of Martineau scholars should spring a succession of ministers not unworthy of the ministry to which he gave his life, then, indeed, would this Conference have raised a fitting memorial. It only remains for you to ensure the success of this school. Buildings, teachers and scholarships will come—I have little fear as to that—will increase and improve and multiply according to the need. Will you send your sons? Is your religion part of your life? Have you found in it your inspiration in all the best and noblest things you have done? Do you desire your children to grow up guided by the same inspiration, worshipping in the same open temple of the living God, and handing them on to your grandchildren and succeeding generations? If yes, then here is a way which I firmly believe will do more than anything else to achieve your purpose. Send your sons to Willaston, and especially those of you who are the salt of our churches, and let a Willaston boy come to mean a boy who will grow up into a man who will be as earnest and as strong in the service of his fellow men as our leading ministers and laymen have been in the past, and who will, like them, find his religious home in our community, and worship in the spirit and in the places from which those who have gone before him have drawn their inspiration. In this school friendships will be formed between boys to be continued at college, which in later life will mean much in our religious and congregational life. An old Willastonian in the pulpit and half-a-dozen in the pew would mean a good deal in the work of a congregation; a group of them in a college, a university, a town—is it too much to dream of a future in which the influence of the successors to the congregations whom we represent would be such as it has never been before? Surely here, if we will use it, is to be a happy hunting-ground for the supply of the ministers of the future. From such soil should spring up the backbone of the future ministry.

To pass on to another point: I think more might be done by parents and ministers to kindle and foster in the young committed to their charge the spirit to which the call to the ministry may come. Who would argue that a parent should press a child to take upon himself the cross of the ministry? It is not like other walks of life. And yet, why should parents, ready enough to suggest, nay, to urge, the idea of medicine, law, commerce, or what not, scrupulously guard against any suggestion of the highest calling, and even show a son whose thoughts may have been led in that direction that they look coldly upon it? It is surely taking a grave responsibility to crush or damp any movement in the young soul that urges him to think of these things. How easily is the spark extinguished which, with a little sympathy, might grow into a flame! Let parents give readily their best and brightest to the service of God, and let ministers seek them out, if haply they may be the means of sowing the seed. If ministers believe in the soundness of their calling, let them see that all those committed to their charge shall feel it also.

I believe that far more of the direct appeal on this subject, especially by our ablest and best ministers, to the youth of our community, is desirable. I do not recollect ever to have heard one of our ministers give the call to the ministry from the pulpit. No doubt the whole life and teaching of the faithful minister is the most effectual call; but the direct appeal in many things just gives the finishing touch which makes the difference between passive yearning and action. On this point I suggest that from time to time some one of our ministers, best fitted to do so, should put his heart into an address directly appealing to our best youths to enter the ministry, which should be available for use by ministers and laymen. If something might be done in this direction by the minister, how much more could he do in intimate, personal, individual intercourse with the youth of his congregations. When the confidence of a young heart full of aspirations and hopes is gained, is it taking too great a responsibility on his shoulders for the minister to whisper in his ear, nay, strongly urge, the Master's call to follow him and preach his gospel. What is the ministry for, if it is not to give this message and to lead souls to the highest service of God?

Another point I have to urge. Let our sons see that we hold our ministers in honour, that they have our highest respect, that they are ever welcome guests in our social and our home circles; let them and theirs be counted among our friends. That this depends not only on us laymen, but also on our ministers, is true enough; but it is for us laymen to take the first step and to go a great deal more than half way.

How often, I fear, is not the minister forgotten or slighted thoughtlessly on occasions when it is his right to be remembered and honoured and our bounden duty to see that his right is not neglected. What, again, are our sons to think of our regard for our ministers when they find out the amount of his salary and, perchance, the amount of our contribution to it?

My last point is this. We want more method than we have in providing for the ministry of the future. It is left far too much to chance.

It is not enough for us to know the kind of men that are wanted, to have a general idea of the various ways in which the ministry may be brought before possible or probable candidates for it, but to leave the initiation entirely to individual effort and thought. Combination and united action are wanted. If the material is not to be found in our community, if this ministry cannot appeal with convincing force to the purer and stronger spirits amongst us, then, indeed, any combined effort on our part would be but beating the air, and any attempt to organise this search for the right men would be but ploughing the sands. Granted—and, indeed, in this matter we must grant this if we are not to be the victims of despair—granted, that our community must have within it and on its borders the right material, and that the ministry in our churches is a field from which a rich harvest may be garnered; then I say emphatically that there is great need of combined action to find the reapers—reapers chosen and trained for the work, and not drifted into it by a number of accidental causes.

Other religious communities look to this much more carefully than we. They do not leave it to chance. I do not urge, I need not explain, that there should be any imitation of the rigid methods of exclusion and training that others may find advisable.

I do urge, however, that we require some Board or Council, constituted of those who best know the needs and the materials of our community in this, and whose special function it shall be to see that the vocation of the ministry shall come before our youth, and to be ready to advise and encourage, and, if need be, to help them on their way to it. Colleges we have ready to train them, but colleges cannot go out into the highways and byways and compel them to come in. We want a Board selected from our leading ministers and laymen representing all parts of the country; not too small to be representative, and above all not so large as to be unworkable, and to divide the responsibility till it is hardly felt. It should be in touch with some one—if not in every congregation, at least in every district—through whom it can act and by whom it can be kept informed. Such a Board would, I imagine, by such methods as may seem best, including, I believe, some of those I have indicated, see that the call to the ministry should permeate into all the veins of our community and congregational life, and should be prepared to give counsel and help, through its representatives or direct, to any possible or probable candidate. This Conference seems to me precisely the body which might take this matter up. Its committee, by a recent resolution, has been given executive powers. If there is to be such a Board, it will not evolve itself, it requires to be constituted. What body can realise the necessities of the case like the Conference of the congregations whose ministry is to be provided for; where, if not here, will the vital and fundamental importance of the question be realised; where, if not here, are we to look for the motive power and instructed skill to set in motion and guide the machinery?

Unless the Conference does realise the crying need, unless it has faith in the message of our ministry, and belief that there will be men to be found who will be worthy and able to deliver it, then, indeed, our religious influence on our nation is destined to wane. Let us throw down the gauntlet. This question is in our hands; are we going to throw up the sponge before we have fairly entered the lists? I have done my best—transgressing, I fear, the limit of time placed at my disposal—to make my main point, and unless you show that there is no need of improvement, or no possibility, or, admitting the need and possibility, that this Conference can do nothing; then I say it is for you to take up this challenge and for your committee to prepare the scheme of a Board or Council representing this Conference, that shall charge itself with the responsibility of leaving no stone unturned, no means neglected, which offers the slightest chance of providing the requisite number of the right kind of men for our ministry. I believe in striking while the iron is hot, and if my view, that this Conference is the right body for the purpose, meets with general approval, I trust you will instruct your committee to take this matter in hand. I have advisedly not propounded a cut-and-dried scheme—that is a work for many heads of different experience—and even if I were prepared with one, I think this would not be the occasion to consider a first draft: the discussion would be bound to run off on minor points. It is enough now to ask: Is such a Board as I have suggested needed, and are we united and strong enough to found one? Is this Conference the body to establish it?

Yes I answer to all three question, confidently, unhesitatingly, and after chewing the cud of this question with some of the patience of a ruminating animal. We are too careless in this matter; too ready to let things take their course; too prone to see only the difficulties and discouragements. Are we satisfied with things as they are? Do we believe that, without strong combined action, the religious community into which we have been born or received need have no anxiety for the future of its ministry? If we are frank, must we not rather admit that there are growing signs of detachment and disintegration, especially in the circles which have been the very life-blood of our community?

I see a vision of a ministry, more and more largely recruited from the ranks of the best that our churches can offer, in closer and closer sympathy and friendship with those who among our congregations are the pillars of our faith, and I believe that if such a vision can be realised, the detaching and disintegrating forces will find a counter-force stronger than they.

And is there not in this pleasure-loving and wealth-seeking age a greater and nobler work than ever for such a ministry as ours ought to be, made up of men who seek to preach only the truth, as it is given to them, with liberty, untrammelled by test or creed, striving to make their religion the law of their own and their hearers' lives? There is no finer field for any ministry than for ours, but the husbandmen for this work must be of our best, men so inspired that they can inspire others, aglow with kindling fire, armed at all points with the armour of righteousness and knowledge. The call for such men comes from the Heavenly Father; His spirit bloweth where He listeth, and the seed of His word is sown broadcast. Are not we faithful enough to be fellow-labourers? Can we do nothing to clear and till the ground, to lay it open to the breathings of the spirit and to prepare it for the seed?

Mr. Charles W. Jones, in the absence of Mr. Richard D. Holt and Mr. Russell Scott who were to have spoken, opened the discussion, and said that if it was difficult to urge their sons to enter the ministry they might at least send them to Willaston School, and see that they were not always dwelling on the discouragements and disadvantages of the ministry as a profession. He thought they should insist on a higher standard of ministerial proficiency, and also of ministerial support.

The Rev. C. J. Street said that the difficulties of a minister's life were not to be denied. It would be an advantage if their ministry was recruited from their old historical families, nurtured in freedom, and trained from generation to generation in honourable and successful commercial enterprise; but when they remembered the sacrifices demanded, the meagre salary, the precarious tenure, the impossibility of making provision for the future, he was not surprised that they were deterred. Their churches needed also a higher conception of the minister's office, not as priest, but as prophet, with freedom to speak out on all subjects of present-day duty. Too often they were urged to be silent on matters of duty and in national emergencies. It had even been complained that they had united to sign a memorial on such a subject, as ministers. They were forgetting the traditions of their churches. If they believed in a Free Church, let them be Free Church, and practice their freedom. He urged the advantage of the establishment of curacies in connection with their churches, and the importance of a proper training at College in the art of preaching and pastoral and public work, a training now so admirably provided for by the Tate lectureship at Manchester College, and in former years so well given by the late John Wright as missionary tutor at the Home Missionary College, and after him by Dr. Brooke Herford.

The Rev. J. E. Odgers repeated what he had said at the Conference at Sheffield, as to the need of some earlier oversight of intending students for the ministry before they came up before the College Committee. He was very glad that Mr. Worthington had alluded to the subject in his paper. They ought to have an Academic Board for the future supply of their ministers, and it could best be established in connection with that representative Conference. He moved:

That the Committee of the Conference be instructed to take into consideration the formation of a Board to assist in providing for the future ministry.

This was seconded by Mr. A. H. Worthington, and carried.

After a closing hymn and the Benediction pronounced by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the meeting adjourned for tea at the Great Meeting Schools.

In the evening the members of the Conference were entertained by the Mayor of Leicester and the Mayoress (Alderman and Mrs. Windley), at a conversazione at the Museum Buildings and Art Gallery. The Mayoress was unfortunately unable to be present, and her place was taken by Miss Windley. The Mayor, in welcoming his guests, said that he did so the more heartily as belonging to another Christian communion. While not yielding one jot or tittle of his faith, he would be simply ashamed if he could not meet such an assembly of Christian men and women, holding different opinions from himself, in a charitable and Christian spirit. He was glad of the opportunity of reciprocating the many kindnesses and courtesies the members of the Unitarian communion in Leicester had extended to members of other Churches. He then referred to his acquaintance with ministers of their communion, the Revs. C. C. Coe, J. P. Hopps, and Joseph Wood, and dwelt upon the great fundamental truths of the Fatherhood of God and human brotherhood in which they were all agreed. On all other questions they might pray for mutual enlightenment. He trusted their meeting in Leicester would have a far-reaching influence for good.

Dr. Blake Odgers proposed, and Mr. E. Clephan seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to the Mayor for his great kindness, and this was carried by acclamation.

The estimate of numbers present at the reception ranged from 1,200 to 1,500, and the evening was greatly enjoyed.

Our report of the further proceedings of the Conference, including the business meeting on Thursday afternoon, will appear next week.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. JOHN WRIGHT, B.A.

John Wright, as all of his old friends and fellow-workers knew him, had so completely retired from for public life the past twenty years, that many had lost sight of him, and some hardly knew if he were still living. But all who were in the working line of our churches and Sunday-schools in the thirty years from 1850 onwards have never lost their vivid impression of his keen and eager activity, have wished that he would once again come out and take his old place, and would feel the sorrow of another old comrade gone, as they read last week of his death.

He was born April 21, 1824, and his earliest memories as a boy were of living with his grandfather, Richard Wright, at Kirkstead, near Boston, whose wandering life as a Unitarian missionary preacher was one of the memories of the opening century. Richard Wright died in 1836, and the grandson, largely through the kindness and help of the Rev. John Kentish, passed his school life in Bristol and Birmingham, and in 1840 entered Manchester New College in the first year of its removal from York. At College he passed five very happy years, among such fellow-students as Travers Madge, T. E. Poynting, Crosskey, Joseph H. Hutton, Robert D. Darbishire, John Davies, T. L. Marshall, his most intimate friend being Rees Lloyd, afterwards long minister at Belper.

He was a diligent student, took several prizes, passed B.A. in the University of London in 1844, and during all those years was a zealous worker in the Lower Mosley-street Sunday-school and its associated institutions, especially in the Natural History Society—one of the band of student teachers whose names are still a Lower Mosley-street tradition.

In 1844 Mr. Wright became engaged to Anna Johnston, daughter of Mr. Thomas Johnston, of Birmingham, and they were married in the following year, when on leaving College Mr. Wright accepted an invitation to York as assistant to the Rev. Mr. Wellbeloved. There, however, he only remained one year, and then returned to Manchester, where he settled to tutorial work in the family of Mr. Edmund Potter, undertaking Sunday duty at Macclesfield. It was then that, among other teaching work, he had for a pupil Brooke Herford, who was busy out of business hours preparing to go to College. Next year he removed to Macclesfield, where he was minister for seven years, during which time he not only increased the congregation, but raised the Sunday-school from 50 to 230.

He was, indeed, the life and soul of the Sunday-school work, not only in his own large school, from which no less than five young men, trained under his strong influence, afterwards became Unitarian ministers, but throughout the district. In 1845, on his suggestion, the Manchester District Sunday-school Association was established by him in conjunction with Travers Madge. It was warmly taken up by the Lower Mosley-street teachers, and Mr. Wright was secretary from 1847 till 1855. Soon the Sunday School Penny Magazine was established, and Mr. Wright was the editor and a constant contributor from 1852 for twelve years. During all that period he was a busy writer, publishing "A Popular Introduction to the Bible," and several sermons and pamphlets. One great pleasure of his Macclesfield life was the formation of a close and lasting friendship with Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Greg, and to this intercourse with them, and the perusal of Mr. F. W. Newman's book on "The Soul," he attributed his mental and spiritual development during this period.

Such earnestness and practical power could not but win for him very high esteem, and in 1853, on the resignation of the Rev. Franklin Howorth, Mr. Wright was invited to the Bank-street Chapel, Bury, where he spent twenty busy years, taking a leading part in the denominational work of the district, and working hard at the organisation of the school and congregation. The congregation was very much strengthened—new and handsome schools were erected, and a large and flourishing day-school was established. At the end of his ministry the congregation numbered more than 800, while a branch school and mission had been established at Heap Bridge.

These were especially Mr. Wright's missionary years. He was almost the originator of the missionary work of the district, the East Lancashire Unitarian Mission being founded in 1858; he was secretary from the formation until 1873. As the work kept increasing, so as to demand more labourers, John Wright was one of the first with whom Dr. Beard took counsel for the establishment of the Home Missionary Board; and when it was started in 1853, he was appointed the first secretary. He continued in this office for several years, and afterwards became one of the tutors, holding the Missionary Tutorship in conjunction with Brooke Herford, the other tutors being Dr. Beard and Rev. William Gaskell. Under the same impulse to make Unitarianism more popular, he was one of the four projectors of the Unitarian Herald, the first attempt to publish a weekly Unitarian paper at a penny.

Other work of importance was done by Wright at this period in connection with the Religious School Books Society, which published "Little Walter" and "Scenes from the Life of Jesus," by Mrs. and Mr. Samuel Greg respectively. Of this Society, too, John Wright was secretary. He also contributed to the Christian Reformer and the Theological Review. He was for some years secretary of the Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Assembly, and took a leading part in the work of the Widows' Fund, both on the committee and afterwards as its president.

But his ministry was always first and last with him, and his keen, eager directness of style gave him a strong hold upon the people. A strong Unitarian, believing in the body as well as the spirit, and attaching great importance to the name, as the open avowal of the truth, his Sunday evening doctrinal lectures attracted crowded congregations. Often he had to differ from old friends, for he was a good deal of a Radical, more so in theology as his life went on; but he was always fearless and definite in announcing his views, and his deep religious earnestness kept the respect of all. His most mature and valuable work was "The Grounds and Principles of Religion."

From all this, it will be seen how very great was Mr. Wright's energy, accompanied, too, by great willingness and power of organisation. If any new institution has started, it seemed to be the natural thing that he should be asked to act as secretary, and if anyone was associated with him in the office, it was generally John Wright who did the work. The inevitable result was that his health suffered. He was often racked with gout, and it became evident, early in the seventies, that he must limit his range of work.

In 1873 he resigned his pulpit at Bury, which he had occupied for twenty busy years, and accepted the invitation of the congregation at Bath. There he passed seven quiet happy years among people to whom he became sincerely attached. But practically his work was done, and in 1880, finding that neither his own health nor Mrs. Wright's was strong, he decided to leave Bath, and never again undertook permanent service. He and Mrs. Wright had now begun to feel the fascination of foreign travel, which they had had little opportunity of enjoying in their busy earlier years. They made several extended tours in France and Italy, spending more than one winter abroad. They made friends wherever they went, and brought back many pleasant recollections. One renewal of active ministry he had, taking three months' service in the newly-established congregation at Wandsworth, just before the settlement of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and then he settled down at the house at Four Oaks, near Birmingham, where he lived to the last; Mrs. Wright died after a somewhat long illness in 1891. This blow Mr. Wright never altogether got over; he was cheerful and happy, surrounded by friends whose happiness he was never tired of promoting, but something had gone out of his life. In these later years he took a less dogmatic view of religion; preferred not to be styled "Rev."; probably would not have wished to be described as a member of a sect, though his interest in Unitarian affairs was never diminished. He had survived nearly all his contemporaries, felt their deaths keenly, especially the loss of tried friends, such as Poynting, Rees Lloyd and Charles Beard. But to the last he took a warm interest in the world, though he never came out into public life again; and one of his greatest pleasures was in receiving visits from his sons and their families.

MR. JOHN BULL.

The congregation at Weymouth have lost one of their oldest members by the death of Mr. John Bull.

His early years were passed in London; he had interesting memories of Edward Irving and Thomas Carlyle as visitors at his father's house, and treasured letters from other leading literary men of the early part of the century. A man of striking appearance and charming manners and conversation, Mr. Bull retained to the last his keen interest in literary matters and in the problems of the day. He had been a tutor in noble families, and was possessed not only of fine scholarship, but extensive scientific knowledge. He never lost his love of teaching, and many young lives have been the better for the sound foundations of learning they received from him. In religion he was an earnest Theist with a heartfelt reverence for Christ, and delighted in talk in the profoundest subjects of the spiritual life. With his friends he has left very precious memories.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Walking in the Dark.

If you were to try to explain what darkness really is, what a difficulty you would have! Imagine some blind man—one, let us say, who had been born blind—asking what you meant by "the dark"; how would you make it clear to him? It is much easier to say what the light is, and to talk about its nature, than to speak accurately about darkness. Although we cannot define or explain it, we all understand very well what is meant by the darkness, and most of us think we know a good deal about it; we have to live in it for about half our lives, and it is one of the things we remember having had to do with from our earliest days. Yet, after all, it is quite strange how little we really know about it, and how seldom we think of it at all. In the first place do we ever find ourselves in real darkness? You think it is quite dark when at night the blinds are drawn, the doors shut, and the light put out; but that is a mistake: it is never absolutely dark anywhere on the surface of the earth (except under some very peculiar conditions), for, strange to say, the earth itself sends out a little light, part of that it received during the hours of sunlight; the very walls of our rooms, and the furniture of the houses, send out feeble rays that spoil the complete darkness. Just as it is almost impossible to get perfect silence, so we never experience true darkness in our ordinary lives. Deep down in the earth, say in some mine or underground cavern, it can be found; and if ever you should be placed where it is really dark, the first thing you will notice will be that darkness can be felt. Your eyes will ache so that to shut them will give a great relief, just as the glare on a sunny day often becomes unbearable.

Here is another strange thing we often do not remember: the bottom of the sea is quite dark, because the light cannot get through more than a certain thickness of water; so, as the great oceans cover the chief part of the earth's surface and are generally so deep that they are measured in miles, there is a whole expanse of darkness, about which perchance we very seldom think.

Again, is it not strange to reflect that all space is dark? The stars, the planets, the earth, the sun, all move through fields of darkness. When you have learnt something about the laws of light you will know that what we call the sun's rays are not light in themselves, but only become light when they strike against some object, glance off (so to speak), and strike the eye. Really, then, it is wonderful to think that there is darkness nearly everywhere and light only just here and there.

In old days people were very much in dread of the dark, and all ancient books contain remarks upon it which show that it was generally considered an evil thing. The Bible has much to say about the darkness, and perhaps it would be worth while if you could find out each passage where "darkness," or "dark," is mentioned and write it out.

In one place there is a very beautiful saying: "The darkness and the light are both alike to Thee." That is not only beautiful, but very true; whenever we feel even in the least afraid of the dark, let us remember that to God there is no difference, that the night to Him "shineth as the day," and we are never hidden from Him or out of His care.

I want you particularly to think about what one writer said, and see if you cannot learn from him even though he has been dead so many years. In what is called the "First Epistle of John" it is written: "He that hateth his brother is in the darkness, and walketh in the darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes." You know what happens when you try to walk in the dark—how you stumble and fall, bruise and hurt yourself, miss your way, and do damage at nearly every step. No one would willingly be in the dark if he could help it, and still less would anyone willingly do much walking in such condition. The good man who wrote those words I have just quoted wanted to tell people that for anyone to hate another—to be angry or cross with some brother or sister, friend or companion—was to enter into darkness; that to go on being angry or hating was like attempting to walk in a place where there was no light at all.

And what he said so long ago is true to-day, and true for each one of you. If you let hate or anger come into your heart you shut out the light, that is, you shut out all true happiness, all real joy in life—you shut out God. If you let such evil feelings remain with you, then for just so long as they remain you are like a man walking in the dark: you will get harm and do harm, your way will be hard and unhappy, your life will be miserable, you will not be able to see the friends and treasures which are all around, and, worst of all, you will lose sight of God; for God is Love, and the boy or girl who hates, hates even one, shuts himself or herself away from God.

Now, I am sure none of you want to walk in this darkness, and I expect it is very seldom that you let such a bad thing as hatred or anger come into your hearts; but there are many men and women whose lives are spent in just such darkness, who often wonder why it is they cannot know that God is close beside them and cares for them every day. The darkness has blinded their eyes; they must first love their fellow men, and then the darkness will roll away. Take care, children, that you are not so foolish. Whenever you feel inclined to be angry with people for something they have done that seems to you hurtful or bad, think of the good things they have done also; and remember, too, that you yourself have sometimes done wrong, or made mistakes, or been unkind, so you can well afford to forgive others since others have so often forgiven you. Keep, then, all darkness out of your hearts, and walk in the light.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Blackpool.—The congregation of the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, have sent a letter to the Rev. David Davis, their late minister, expressing interest and pleasure in his settlement at Banks-street, and the wish that health and strength may be granted him, and that the Divine blessing may rest upon all his labours.

Bolton: Halliwell-road Mission.—The first annual congregational tea-party was held at the Mission on Saturday, March 31. Many friends from Bank-street were present, and a few even from the Walmsley congregation, who helped to make the gathering a most gratifying success. About 230 sat down to tea, and there were fully 250 at the subsequent meeting and entertainment, which was presided over by Mr. A. W. Broughton. An excellent programme was rendered, arranged by Mr. Joseph Broughton, the superintendent of the Mission Sunday-school; and addresses were given by the Revs. C. J. Street and N. Anderton. The generous response of the parent church at Bank-street, in providing the necessary funds for the establishment and equipment of the Mission, was referred to, and a hope expressed that the future would see the founding of an independent congregation and the erection of a permanent church building in the Halliwell district. The proceedings, which were most enjoyable and interesting throughout, were brought to a close with a vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Mr. Thomas Harwood, and seconded by Mr. Caleb Wood, secretary of the congregation. Since the opening of the Mission in December last, the results have been very encouraging. There is now an average attendance of seventy-two at the Sunday-school, which is at present only held in the afternoon, and of 64 at the evening service. The envelope-offertory system of membership has been adopted by the congregation, and fifty-three names are already enrolled. A Band of Hope and a Mothers' Meeting, under the direction of Mrs. Street, have also been started.

Burnley (Appointment).—The Rev. E. A. Voysey, B.A., of Reading, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of Trafalgar-street Unitarian Church, and will enter upon his duties there on May 6. On Sunday last an interesting and touching ceremony was held in the school. The president of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, had sent a beautiful lamp for presentation to Mr. Peter Bibby, who has been a Sunday-school teacher continuously for fifty-five years, the longest record of any teacher in the district. The lamp was presented to Mr. Bibby at the close of afternoon school. Mr. J. T. Bibby, the superintendent, presided, and Mr. Samuel Holden addressed the school, remarking that Mr. Bibby had been engaged in the noblest work that any man could take up. Men measure success by money or social position, but Mr. Bibby's success was nobler far than any that could be measured by material standards. The presentation was made by Mr. J. S. Mackie on behalf of Mr. Grundy, and Mr. Bibby made a feeling response. In accepting the lamp, Mr. Bibby expressed his thanks to Mr. Grundy for his thoughtful consideration, and to the speakers for their kind words. Though often discouraged, he said, he had not been without his reward. He had had many testimonies to the good that has resulted from his work, and had expected no such recognition as that beautiful gift. Hymn and prayer brought a very impressive incident to a close.

Lynn.—The Rev. John Felstead preached on Sunday week, and his services were much appreciated. On Monday, in connection with the Annual Sunday-school Prize Distribution, there was a tea in the schoolroom, followed by a concert, Mr. Felstead in the chair, when there was a large gathering, the schoolroom being completely filled. The ex-Mayoress of Lynn (Mrs. Bunkall) kindly distributed the prizes. There was a capital programme of vocal and instrumental music and a laughable sketch by members of the Young People's Guild, and Mr. Murton lent a gramophone. A vote of thanks to the ex-Mayoress, the Chairman, and all who had taken part, brought a pleasant and successful evening to a close.

Todmorden.—The extended school buildings were opened last Saturday, service being first held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. Principal Gordon. The ceremony of opening the new buildings was performed by Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Bart., M.P., to whom a silver key was presented by Mrs. Hawksworth Barker. After tea, of which about 600 partook, an evening meeting was held, presided over by Mr. James Crabtree, when addresses were given by the chairman, Mr. Hawksworth Barker, Rev. A. W. Fox, Dr. J. H. Barker (chairman of the Todmorden School Board), Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Principal Gordon, the Rev. S. J. J. Shaw, T. B. Evans, J. A. Smith, of Cloughford Congregational Church, and others. On Sunday the services were conducted by the Rev. A. W. Fox in the morning, and the Rev. S. A. Steinthal in the evening. Letters were received from Dr. Brooke Herford and Rev. E. Parry, former ministers, and other friends, who were unable to be present, expressing their congratulations and sympathy on the occasion.

Resolutions

PASSED AT THE

ELEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING.

At the Eleventh Annual Meeting, held at Mansford-street, on Wednesday, March 15, 1900, C. W. Jones, Esq., in the Chair, the following Resolutions were passed:—

Reports read.

1.—Moved by the Chairman, and seconded by the Rev. E. Daplyn.

"That the reports now read be received, adopted and printed for circulation, under the direction of the Committee."

2.—Moved by Mr. Ion Pritchard, and seconded by the Rev. H. Allen.

"That the following Ladies and Gentlemen be the Committee and Officers for the ensuing year:—Mrs. E. B. Squire, Miss E. G. Baily, the Rev. Dr. Herford, Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., the Rev. R. H. V. Bloor, the Rev. E. Daplyn, Messrs. W. J. Clark, J. G. Foster, A. F. Grundy, J. R. Grundy, F. Lawrence, H. B. Lee, and E. B. Squire; Treasurer, Miss L. Jones; Secretaries, Mr. S. W. Preston and Mr. J. Classon Drummond; Auditors, Mr. E. B. Squire and Mr. Heald."

3.—Moved by Mr. S. W. Preston, and seconded by the Rev. V. Davis.

"That this meeting, whilst congratulating the Committee and the Rev. W. G. Cadman on the general tone of the reports, would urge the absolute necessity of a larger increase of support by personal help in one or more of the many agencies at work, and by a considerable addition to the funds by annual subscription, thus enabling the Committee to keep the premises in proper repair, without being in debt to their Treasurer."

4.—Moved by Mr. Squire, and seconded by Mr. W. J. Clark.

"That the best thanks of the Meeting be given to Mr. C. W. Jones for his great kindness in taking the chair this evening."

London Permanent Chapel Building Fund

An Appeal to Unitarians to assist in raising at least £12,000 for the support and spread of Liberal Christianity in the Metropolitan Area.

President—Sir JOHN T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P. | Chairman of Committee—W. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., LL.D.
Treasurers—FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD, Esq., and FRANK PRESTON, Esq.

(1.) A portion of the Fund, not exceeding one-third of the net amount raised, shall be devoted to paying off debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of, some of our chapels and halls in or near London. The particular congregations to receive this assistance, and the amount of the assistance to be given to each such congregation, shall be settled by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, regard being had to the efforts made by each congregation to help itself.

(2.) The remainder of the Fund, not less than two-thirds of the whole, will be formed into a Permanent Chapel Building Fund for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with OPEN TRUSTS. This Fund shall be vested in a body of twelve Trustees, who shall be nominated in the first instance by the Council of Ministers and Delegates and the Subscribers to the Special Fund. The Trustees shall have a voice in the selection of the site, and shall themselves decide what amount they will advance towards the cost of its purchase and of the erection of the building.

(3.) The sum so advanced shall be a charge on the land and building, and shall be repaid in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Trustees shall in each case deem proper. The Trustees in their discretion may remit payment of interest. The income of such portion of the Fund as is not out on loan, and the interest on any loans, shall either be paid to the Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, or added to the capital of the Fund, as the Trustees may in each case determine.

EASTER MORN, 1900.

RISE, Easter morn, upon his resting place,
Where loving hands have laid the spring's young flowers,
And though he now has found God's perfect grace,
He will look down and bless this dawn of ours.

Shine, Easter morn, into our hearts that sleep,
And from that living death our spirits save,
That we may look to him across the deep,
Steadfastly journey to as blest a grave.

EDWARD TESCHEMACHER.

THE great interest and importance attaching to the meetings of the National Conference has led us to devote the greater part of two enlarged numbers to the papers read, and a report of the proceedings. Much more in the speeches we should have been glad to report, if space had permitted, but for a completer record we must refer our readers to the official Report, to be issued shortly by the Conference Committee as a separate publication. And as it is, we are conscious of having been obliged to deal hardly with the reports of other important meetings which were deserving of much more attention, if it had not been for what we judged to be the paramount claim of the National Conference.

WE had intended to publish this week a number of "Impressions" of the Conference, from correspondents in different parts of the country, but are obliged to hold them over until next week.

THE April New Kingdom is a National Conference number, containing an illustrated account of Leicester, a short article on the growth of the Conference constitution, by Mr. A. W. Worthington, and a series of interesting biographical notices of "Some of the Speakers. Profusely Illustrated." In view of the year 1900, several of the portraits look amusingly young; but they all look happy, and it could hardly be otherwise in a Conference number.

WE are glad to hear from Babu Protab Chunder Mozoomdar that he is to attend the International Council of Unitarians in Boston next month, to bear to that meeting, which will commemorate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association, greetings from the members of the Brahmo Somaj of India. Mr. Mozoomdar expects to be in London in the first week of May, and we understand that it has been arranged that he shall preach at Highgate. After his visit to America, Mr. Mozoomdar hopes to return to this country, and to be able then to undertake some further work here. The greatest interest will attach to his visit, and Mr. Mozoomdar, who is already personally known to many of our friends, may be assured of a most cordial welcome.

DR. JOHN WATSON'S "Life of Jesus Christ" continues to run its picturesque and disappointing course through the Sunday Strand. The March number contains an account of John the Baptist, and of the baptism of Jesus. Of John it is said :—

> Before he was born he did homage to his mighty Kinsman, before Whose face he was to run. Signs and wonders attended the child, and marked him off from the herd of men as one on whom the hand of the Eternal was surely resting.

Yet in explaining that John afterwards did not know his kinsman, nor expect that he was the Messiah, Dr. Watson warns us not to forget—

> How the most sacred and vivid experiences fade and lose their meaning even with saintly souls, so that Jesus once gently chided his mother because she forgot the mystery of his annunciation and nativity (!), saying, "Wist ye not?"

The baptism of Jesus is described as "a deliberate emptying of himself, and the first step to the Cross." The attempt to illustrate the scene, with the spirit in bodily form as a dove, comes dangerously near the grotesque. The April number deals with the beginning of the ministry of Jesus, and the first scene is the marriage at Cana, describing how Jesus turned water into wine, and there follows immediately the driving of the money-changers out of the temple at Jerusalem, which it is a pity the artist attempted to illustrate.

THE current number of the London Quarterly Review, the Wesleyan Quarterly, contains an article on "Dr. Martineau" by the Rev. P. T. Forsyth, D.D., most generous in its appreciation, and deeply interesting in its criticism. The first section of the article, headed "The Saint," opens as follows :—

> The death of Dr. James Martineau removes one of those lives that do more than all fleets or armies to make a people great and keep them so. It is a great and noble nation that cherishes its men of genius more than its armaments, that prizes ideal beauty more than material success, that thinks its prophets more dear than politicians, its saints than its bishops, and dwells on the conquests of its seers more than on the extension of its territory.

And later in the article we read :—

> Martineau's theology was of the Greek and not the Latin type. He was Greek in his subtlety, in his grace, in his lucidity, in his ideality. But he was a very Christian Greek; and he found the food of his soul among the great saints of Hebraism, Catholicism, and Evangelicalism.

Here we only call attention to Dr. Forsyth's article; but his criticisms demand respectful attention.

THE Guardian quotes from the Natal Diocesan Magazine for March some letters of the Bishop's, in one of which he gives reasons for not having appointed any day of special humiliation. "There is," he says, "something wrong in the thought that God has now intervened, has now begun to deal with us, or that we are called on to humble ourselves as we should not have been, if we had been uniformly successful, or that our reverses are a sign of God's anger." And in a later passage, the following sentences occur:—

What I would rather set before us all is the aim and the prayer that the vision of a higher, sterner life, of a grander self-sacrifice, of a more perpetual bearing of the burden of duty and responsibility as members of a great Empire, called to work and not to play, to suffer, not to enjoy, may remain with us as a permanent possession in the sunshine, when God brings it back, as it has assuredly been with us in the dark night of our suspense. The man who gazes at that vision most wistfully, and presses towards it most ardently, will be the first to feel how much need there is for humiliation and repentance, how far we have been in the past from God's—

Ancient Sacrifice
An humble and a contrite heart.

How often we have failed to bear patiently and devotedly the "white man's burden"; how lightly our vast responsibility to the more backward races has sat upon us; how we have lagged behind in the steep ascent of duty. But he will not so misread the central lesson of Christianity, the lesson of the Cross of Calvary, as to think that apparent failure is a sign of God's anger, or that wounds and death are necessarily punishments. He will hail the bracing air of adversity, happy that he can—

Be crossed and thwarted as a man
Not left in God's contempt apart,
With ghastly, smooth life, dead at heart,
Tame in earth's paddock as her prize.

A PLEA TO BE READ.

Sir,—I do not write to raise controversy, but I would very respectfully beg all those who have blamed the recent "Memorialists," all those who thought it prudent to guard the Conference from any reference to the war, all those of the Memorialists themselves who may have had qualms of misgiving under the drastic criticisms lavished on them, all those who think that too much fuss has been made about the suppression of free speech—and all those, I will add, who may have been depressed with the fear that the old prophetic spirit was dying out of our churches and pulpits—to buy (yes, buy) and read the profoundly impressive address on free speech just published by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, Liverpool Booksellers' Company, Ltd., 70, Lord-street, Liverpool. Price, threepence.

THROUGH NATURE TO GOD.

Sir,—May I be allowed to add a few words of appreciation to Mr. Lummis' already appreciative review of Fiske's "Through Nature to God." For besides being profoundly interested in the book myself, I have found it of inestimable value in convincing the doubtful of the central truth of Theism. This theme is principally dealt with in his third essay on the "Everlasting Reality of Religion." Perhaps the most striking feature of this part is that Professor Fiske, instead of confining his observations to historical eras, such as the Christian or Hebrew dispensations, carries the reader back to the dim shadow lands of prehistoric evolution, and gathers his data from so vast a field of time (embracing, possibly, some hundred thousand years or more of human yearnings) that one seems to stand in the presence of a mighty cosmic process which decades and centuries and even millenniums of stagnation or retrogression can hardly disfigure. Having shown most convincingly that physical evolution can only develop in response to the stimuli of external realities (illustrated by a scientific account of the gradual and exquisite evolution of the eye, in growing response to the abiding fact of light), he then submits that no purely tentative or capricious feature in human nature could continue developing for any long period without some corresponding reality in the outer universe to stimulate and encourage it. He next points out the solemn and majestic growth from the cave-dweller's dim perceptions of a life to be provided for (and possibly powers to be propitiated) beyond the grave to the sublime vision, for instance, of Dante's Comedy. This—by far the most startling and characteristic feature of human, in contrast to brute, evolution—cannot be seriously supposed to have so persisted, entirely unstimulated by any cosmic reality. For the perfect vision of this reality we are left with our yet unperfected powers still to feel after. But surely no sincere truth-lover can fail to be stimulated and uplifted by this new demonstration of the old faith that whatever it is, it is real; and, moreover, that the prophets, the Christs, the apostles and poets of earth have never laboured and loved in vain, but have each revealed something of the absolute and unchanging truth, bringing the race surely nearer to the unveiled vision when we shall know even as we have been known. LONDON UNITARIAN BAZAAR.

Sir,—It has been suggested that a stall devoted entirely to the sale of curios would be an attractive feature at the bazaar, and in order that this suggestion may be carried out, will those friends who have curios in their possession, which they are willing to part with, kindly make a contribution? Geological or natural history specimens, coins, old prints, stamps, or in short curios of every description, will be gladly accepted. This appeal has the sanction of Dr. Blake Odgers, the Chairman of the Bazaar Committee.

All contributions should be sent without delay to Essex Hall, labelled "Curios Stall." W. Sharman.

Warden of Avondale Church,
Peckham, April 10.

Sir,—The Committee of the London Bazaar will be glad if friends will kindly send their contributions and articles, &c., to the local Church Bazaar secretaries, or to Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., not later than the 20th inst. The price should be attached to every article.

T. E. M. Edwards (Secretary).

P.S.—The announcement of the Bazaar proceedings can be seen in the advertising column.

MANCHESTER UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

This Union, which embraces all our Sunday-schools in Manchester, celebrated its Jubilee on Saturday, March 31. At three o'clock a service was held in Cross-street Chapel, the first part of which was conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. James Drummond. Dr. Drummond took his text from John xiv. 15 and 21; and based upon it an eloquent discourse on the service that springs from love.

After tea, in the Lower Mosley-street School, a public meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Mr. Henry Woodhead, President of the Union, in the chair. It was announced that both the Rev. Joseph Freeston and Mr. C. C. Grundy (President of the District Sunday School Association) were unable to be present owing to illness.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal gave some very interesting reminiscences of the old days of the Union, and traced its growth out of what was then called the United Teachers' Meeting. He regretted the absence of Mr. Freeston, whose work in the old days has always been remembered with gratitude. He recalled to mind the good work done by Messrs. Curtis, Brooke Herford, Geo. Smith, Travers Madge, R. Pilcher, J. J. Tayler, Dr. Beard, Dr. Marcus, and others.

Mr. George Smith said the old days had made too deep an impression upon his life ever to be forgotten. It might be a good thing for the dead past to bury its dead; but there was a living past, a bright, cheerful, inspiring past which could shed a light upon their path and inspire for present work.

Dr. Drummond said he believed in a grander future than the world had ever yet seen. Their methods changed, but their supreme object remained as the culture of all that is grandest and noblest in the hearts and minds of their scholars. Every church should be a missionary Church, and the Sunday-school was the missionary agency of the church.

Mr. T. F. Robinson also spoke of the work and aim of the Union. It was a refreshing and inspiriting meeting, of which we should have been glad, if possible, to give a much fuller report.

To Correspondents.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—W. A.; C. E. B.; T. P. B.; M. C.; D. E.; J. F.; T. P. G.; G. L. H.; O. E. H.; J. M. K.; T. L. M.; E. A. P.; G. H. P.; E. B. R.; H. R.; H. D. R.; J. C. S.; J. L. S.; A. D. T.; J. J. W.

JAMES MARTINEAU.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS BY THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.*

It is a difficult yet a pleasant task which is imposed on me by the invitation of this Conference—pleasant for I loved and reverenced the public character and work of James Martineau, and difficult because I knew so little of him in private. What I knew was full of charm, but it was not much. I made a late entrance into the fold of which he was the shepherd. I did not grow up as a lamb under his care, nor follow his guidance over the hills of philosophy or the mild meadows of theology. Others were told what grass to eat or to avoid, at what brooks to drink, how to shelter from the storms, how to beat back the wolves—not I. That wise and tender training I missed, and I have regretted that it was not mine. I am not able, then, to speak as fitly of him as those students and friends who have always belonged to him, lived with him, and watched, in a more inner circle than I had the right to enter, his declining years and his accomplished labours. I never heard him lecture. I heard him preach once in Little Portland-street Chapel, but so long ago that I do not recall the matter of his sermon, and only that his delivery was not equal to his thoughts. Once I heard him make a speech, and was delighted with its grasp, its arrangement, its ease of expression, its dignity and its eloquence, and thought he might have made an admirable debater, but I doubted whether he would have made a convincing debater. The speech was chilled by being too literary, too finished, too elaborate in style, too unbroken by natural passion to persuade—and it failed to persuade the meeting. I confess I have found the same over-finish and its correlative want of spontaneity in many of his prayers and sermons. This is all I knew of him as teacher, preacher, or speaker, and it is plain that from these infinitesimal data, I have no right to make any particular inferences. Ignorance supplies no ground for personal criticism. You will then, I trust, pardon all that may seem ill-advised in the speech of one who for the greater part of his life had no knowledge, save a public knowledge, of James Martineau.

The first thing that struck a stranger introduced to him was his graciousness. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ was in his heart, and it lit his countenance. His quiet eyes, recalled from far-off ways to meet the moment; his smile like that of a child still near to the Imperial Palace; the offer of his hand which seemed to speak a welcome, were all instinct with that graciousness which arises from natural springs in the heart—from thoughtfulness for others, from humility, and self-forgetfulness. I never met a man in whom humility was so natural. Its presence in all his ways convinced vain men of their fault, and led them to redeem themselves from vanity more than any blame would have done. It showed them how beautiful was humility, and they followed its shining. I think that self-pridefulness was impossible to him. He may have smiled to himself in congratulation when he finished a well-built sentence or a well-rounded piece of dialectic, but this was with the pleasure of an artist, not with vanity—for, indeed, he had gone too far into the infinitudes of thought and form to think that any work of his was worthy of self-praise. He who sees, like Martineau, the Eternal Ideas, and sees them moving from an absolute Will of Righteousness through the spiritual, moral, and physical creation, cannot have any pride in his own work. No one can tell what power to help, inspire and bless this absence of self-thinking and feeling has communicated to the characters and work of those who knew him, and, in another way, to those who have read his books, and his character in them. For this lowliness of heart is a part of Self-forgetfulness—that mighty energy of the spiritual universe, which, when it takes form in a man's soul, acts in a thousand diverse manners for the redemption, development, and perfecting of men.

You who listen to me must recall a hundred instances of this gracious thoughtfulness shown to you. I recall one specially shown to myself. I happened to visit him one day shortly after I left the Church and before my first administration of the Holy Communion. "I do not know," he said, "if I can join in your Communion Service. I have not seen it, and I am not aware as yet of your views on the matter." "Well," I answered, "I will send you the printed service, and I shall preach on the subject, and then you will do as you think fit." The day came, and Martineau, after the sermon, took special pains to be the first person to receive from my hands the bread and wine. A large number were present, and the effect of this gracious act convinced them that our leader gave me his brotherly support; but I think it was more a private kindness on his part than a public support. He would certainly, in his humility, think of the former and not of the latter. However that may be, the thoughtful trouble he took to be first at the table, the kindly graciousness of his attitude I have never forgotten and never will forget. The fine flower of courtesy was there—that courtesy which men forget so often or think needless, but which, nevertheless, has far more redeeming, helping and impelling power over the hearts and lives of men than a host of good deeds roughly done or good books written without graciousness. It is wise to pray that the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us, as it was on the life and manners of James Martineau.

Alongside of this, and perhaps balancing it, there was a certain apartness in him, which checked boldness, called to order flippancy of thought, rebuked all moral carelessness, and ministered to reverence. A feeling kindred to awe, but modified by his kindness, fell in his presence on anyone who treated lightly, either in act or speech, the high demands of conscience, intellectual truth, or the sanctity of the human affections. "Thou shalt not take the character of the Lord thy God in vain," was deeply rooted in his nature. Even those who felt with him on these lofty matters shared in this feeling, for they understood how far more than they he lived in the difficult air of these mighty powers. There was, then, a certain remoteness in Martineau, as of one who moved at times outside of humanity, who loved indeed humanity, and for the most part went in and out among men, but who retired when it pleased him over the border into the regions of the Absolute, where the great Ideas walk and rest in their valleys and the primal spiritual Presences breathe intellectual clearness, moral peace, and Love's infinite perfection. This sense of reverence has fallen on me from time to time when I have read passages in his writings in which, with reiterating expansion, he developed his conception of the moral Imperative in human nature, and opened it, by successive arguments, into necessary union with God.

But it was not only by his work in the world of morals that I was thus impressed. The same awe fell on me one day, when in sober autumn evening I read in a provincial garden an essay of his, addressed solely to a the reasoning faculty, in which he strove by a series of arguments, interlaced like a fugue, and mounting step by step, to realise an intellectual conception of the Deity.

I have never believed that we can reach, by purely intellectual means, a realisation of God. Only love, incapable of ending or of limitation, can unite itself, in conscious joy, with the endless and illimitable Godhead. But as I read this noble argument, piled like Ossa on Pelion and Olympus on Ossa, it seemed to reach into Heaven itself, and to image God for the intellect alone. This was a strange experience for me, a revelation of regions of Being in which I had not moved. I had, naturally, believed in God as pure Thought, but I had never seen Him by thought alone. And now it appeared possible; and so strong was the impression that God Himself seemed to be beside me in the garden.

In both these oceans of human activity, in that of morals and in that of intelligence, the genius of Martineau had power to lift a tidal wave on which we were borne upwards—till we were left, as it ebbed, under the throne of God, and looking into the light of His countenance. Thus he took us into the infinite of God with himself. Indeed no conviction was stronger in him than that of Man's natural infinitude in God, and he instilled into us this conviction. It is one of his best legacies to us. Our world, in spite of the preaching of death, has begun to feel through him, as in another fashion it felt through Browning, that our destiny, our being's heart and home, is with the illimitable and the eternal, with deathless hope and life,

> Effort and expectation and desire,
> And something evermore about to be.

Well, this greatness of his set him somewhat apart, not by his own desire, from ordinary men and women. He whose thoughts wander through eternity cannot help being solitary. He does not wish to be companionless, but those less inured to thought as it spreads undivided and operates unspent, less near to the deep sources of moral Power in God, cannot accompany him in these dread excursions beyond the flaming walls. No one who knew Martineau but has seen this apartness in his face, from time to time, as of one far withdrawn into the spaceless and timeless world. Then, his countenance was still; the soul had left it on travels of discovery. It looked as if carved in marble —"the silent image of a mind for ever Voyaging through strange seas of thought, alone."

And now, leaving this impression of his work in the moral and intellectual regions, I have something to say of his work in that spiritual region, by the powers of which we hunger and thirst for absolute Love and Beauty, and are filled with them; by which we reach after infinite perfection in holiness and its peace; by which we claim personal union and communion with God Himself; and in which we transcend in aspiration all that the senses disclose, the intellect shapes, or the conscience demands—the world where Man, the Son, knows himself directly in the Father, and knows the Father directly in himself.

I do not think that Martineau realised his powers in that world or that world itself, as fully as he realised the intellectual and moral worlds or his powers in them. His writings, I allow, seem to contradict this view of mine. He expresses in them, and over and over again, his profound conviction that the nearest approach to God is through Love in us yearning to be at one with the absolute Love from whence it came, through the passion of our imperfect Righteousness to attain its perfection, through the desire of the storm-wearied soul for the clearness of God's peace, and through the strife of the baffled Being within us to find absolute joy. On these, and many other aspects of the spiritual life he dwells continually, not only in his sermons but also in his philosophical writings. And where best he dwells on them is in those passages of singular and reverential beauty in which he explains and loves the character and doings of Jesus Christ.

But the proclamation of this conviction, deep as it was—that the last and highest way to the Father was through the Spirit—was not so easy and natural for him as the proclamation of the way to God through the intellectual and moral paths on which he moved as a monarch, and at home. I do not mean that he is not at home in the spiritual mansions, but that he is less at home in them than in those built by the intellect and the moral sense.

I feel this lesser Heimlichkeit chiefly in his style. In passages dealing with intellectual or moral subjects the style is easy, noble, natural, weighty with matter, ornamented, but not too much; and there are many such passages which are masterpieces of English writing. They well up, with the clearness of a mountain spring, out of his nature. But in the passages and sermons on the spiritual life and its powers, the style is not so natural. A certain effort appears in it, and labours, often heavily, to reach clear expression. It is over-adorned, and the excess of ornament produces a sense of chillness. When the writing seems impassioned and desires to be so, it rarely penetrates, as the pure spiritual imagination does, into the heart of the thing described. Those who read these elaborate passages are moved, but not deeply moved. They are moved by their sense of the writer's strong conviction that what he says is true. They are not deeply moved by the things said, not half so deeply moved as they have been by his work on the things of God seen by the intellect and the conscience.

I think this view is true, but I put it forward with diffidence. I believe that he arrived at the close-fibred convictions he had concerning the predominance of the things of the spirit, by passing first through the things of the intellect and the conscience in their relation to God; but that is not the path the man takes to whom the things of the spirit are natural, and therefore expressed with ease and passion. Such a man, like the writer of the Gospel of St. John, first lives in the spirit, and then, from the spirit, realises God in the conscience and the intellect. Martineau, on the other hand, was led to the spiritual life by discovering where the conscience and the intellect failed in finding the last and highest truths of God and man.

It is for that reason, I think, that he had not, in his work, the spiritual world under his command as fully as he had the intellectual and moral worlds. In fact, he was not born with a large and piercing imagination, nor with the deep emotions of a mystic. There are many criticisms, for instance, on the story of Christ in the Gospels which he would not have made had he by nature possessed those qualities. Moreover, I think that if he had possessed those qualities he would have known more of the passions, sins, and sorrows of men and women, and spoken to them more vitally than it seems to me he does in his books. There also he was somewhat apart from humanity.

It is not without a further intention that I have dwelt upon this view. It leads me to a special observation concerning the battle he fought for us against that tendency to exclude God from nature and humanity which has prevailed in English society of every class for the last sixty years. Having to be a General in that battle, it was just as well for us that he did not possess, in their fuller forms, the spiritual powers. They frequently, except in their highest types, blunt the keenness of the intellect, and dim the clearness of moral demands. And what we most wanted in theology and religion for the last sixty years was a man of the finest intellectual power and of the deepest moral convictions, who should believe not only in God, but also that the human intellect and conscience, with all their workings, were only to be fully explained, and given their full exercise, in the realm of that belief. We needed a man who, in the sphere of the pure intellect and of the personal and social conscience, should boldly meet the foes of the spiritual world in man. We needed one who should do this not by emotional appeals addressed only to the spirit in us—the existence of which spirit was denied by our adversaries—but by clear reasoning addressed to the intellect, and logically mounting up to God from the known facts of conscience. There were many who, under the sway of Science and of Criticism, tended to get rid of God as needless, of the soul as a figment, and of immortal life as a superstition. "There is no intellectual proof," it was said, "of these things, and the religion which belongs to them has done moral harm to the progress of mankind. Let us put them aside and live without them." "I accept," said Martineau, "your intellectual and ethical ground, and from that I start my argument for God, for the soul, and for its infinity in infinite Love. I accept, and with pleasure, all that science has proved, and I know what it has proved. I give its full weight to the work of the pure intellect; but, though I find much in it which dissolves orthodox beliefs, I find nothing in it which dissolves the idea of God or of the eternal soul of Man. I accept all the well-founded conclusions of historical criticism on the story of Christianity, but the spirit of Christ's teaching and the life he lived remain untouched by that criticism. I meet, in your region of the intellect and of the conscience, the denial of God, of the soul, and of the religious truths bound up with God's Fatherhood with a decided contradiction." And he argued that contradiction on the chosen ground of his opponents, on the ground of Reason and Morals, of Philosophy and Ethics with a success which the world more and more confesses, and with so triumphant a joy in his argument that he sometimes passes into a humorous mockery of his adversaries, like a fencer so sure of his skill in a duel that he chaffs his opponent as he fights. A man of this philosophic power, rather than a man of spiritual mysticism, was, I repeat, what we most needed in the long struggle of the last sixty years; and the victory which the ideas of God, and the Soul, and Immortality are now beginning to secure over their enemies, is largely due to Martineau's stern and quiet leadership, under the banners of the intellect and the conscience, of the soldiers of religion. He taught, strictly within the realms of philosophy and criticism, that all science begins and ends in God; that all ethics begin and end in God; and that without the postulate of the soul in man akin to God and going to Him, science and ethic have no secure foundation. No other man has done this needful work so firmly or so clearly as he has done. Even the Church of England, with its cry "Can any good thing come out of the Unitarian Village," has been goaded into dim confessions of his use.

On the whole, I have no doubt that the battle is practically won against the forces of godless science and godless ethics, and that Martineau has been the best builder, among many others, of a religion, bound up with Jesus Christ, rooted in the confession of the Fatherhood of God, which is agreeable to reason, and in full accordance with the ethical progress of man in history. He has done this because he was a master in the intellectual and moral rather than in the spiritual world. But he would not have done it had he not also lived, loved and believed in the Spirit.

And more and more, when he had fought out the fight, and his intellectual and moral work was done, he came to abide in the world of the Spirit, closer and closer to the everlasting peace and love, so that his life reached fulness of being. Nor can I express that better than in his own words, written out of his own experience: "In the trembling of age and the stealthy approaches of the last sleep, the dear presence of an Almighty Guardian, to whom age is as childhood, and who unites the future with the past, fills the deepening shadows with a mild and holy light. Let Him only be near; and the obscuring veil of mortal ill that sometimes seems to shut us in, and tempts us to believe in nothing but the sad rain, is soon withdrawn, like the cloud lifting itself from out the glen; and the sunshine first glorifies, then dissipates the haze, leaving the mountain range of immovable goodness and beauty clear against the everlasting sky. So pass the storms away, so deepens the heavenly view, to the soul that will but rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him."

This, then, was the battle he fought, and he had many and effective allies within himself to help him to conquest. He had untiring industry, a natural instinct which discerned what knowledge could perform, and diligence to learn it; and his excellent powers of mind, thoroughly and carefully trained from his youth up, were always ready at his beck and call. "Do this," he said, and they did it, whatever it was, year after year, without a break, without a weakness. Then he had great quietude of soul, with impetuosity; strong, even stern, determination of will, with tenderness; a splendid amalgam for consistent work in life.

No stain of the world rested on him—none of the pride of life; no mean ambition, no craven hope. He comprehended his trust and the work God gave him to do, and to the same—

Kept faithful with a singleness of aim;
And therefore did not stop, nor lie in wait
For wealth or honours or for worldly state.

He looked on all he could see of human life with steadiness and an intellectual sympathy, not swayed hither and thither by transient excitements or depressions in society. His intellect, both synthetic and analytic, enabled him to see life in its parts as parts, but also to see it whole, as far as his intellectual eye could reach. The great variety of things did not prevent him from finding the central ideas in which all varieties are contained and reconciled, and his grasp of these centres of unity gave him power in public teaching, and brought him that private peace in his soul, so needful for a teacher. He had one sense for moral judgments and a sure belief in their one Source. He was convinced of One Power, the perfect image of right reason; of One Energy of Thought in nature maturing its processes by steadfast laws; and of One Energy of Love working in humanity, and evolving it into final righteousness and truth. Above all, he was deeply conscious of his own distinct personality in God, and therefore of the distinct personality of all his brother men; and out of that arose, first, just reverence for God, for man, and for himself; then absolute detachment from transient and dogmatic theories in religion and philosophy, and finally steady cheerfulness in life and steady movement to his known and well-loved aims.

Such a mind, abiding in a few master-ideas, is nourished into strength by their infinities, sustained in the battle for truth by constant messages from the divine world, knows a central place amid the agitation of the world, and lives, works, and is wrought upon, for the good and help of mankind.

So the long campaign he fought did not give him much trouble. It lasted all his life, but it was waged when he was eighty years old with the same spirit of faithfulness and hope with which it was begun; for the hand of Age was light upon him and rested on his shoulder like a friend's. Other men complained of the stress of the battle, but it was never a weariness to him,

Whose high endeavours were an inward light,
That made the path before him always bright.

Moreover, though his pleasure in honest fighting was very great, he was not without a serene and quiet country in his soul, where he could always find an hour of refreshment with his divine Friend and Father. Then, too, when serious crises came in the contest, he liked that well. It was not with fearful solemnity that he met them, but with courageous joy. Like Wordsworth's happy warrior, he was then "happy as a Lover, and attired with sudden brightness, like a man inspired." He could trust his courage, which was in him not slowly attained but instinctive—one of the roots of his nature; and, finally, of all the weapons with which he fought he had made himself master. He trusted them, he trusted himself, and he trusted God who had made him for the war and given him his arms. Such a warrior is not wearied or depressed by the battle, but cheerful and cheering to his men. And to us he has left, as part of his legacy, this inspiration, this delight in fighting the good fight of faith. May it abide and grow in us for ever.

Lastly, it is a worthy and full consolation to his family, to his friends, and to us who belong to his Church, that his life and work were a complete whole—a web woven closely throughout, and finished to the last flower in the pattern. What pleased him when he was young, what he projected then, he carried through in a long and active life; moving onward to the end,

From well to better, daily self-surpast.

He, in his humility, was not likely to think of his completeness, but we think it. He finished his great books on philosophy and religion, and then he collected all he thought worth preserving of his occasional essays written in the heat of the battle he fought, and on its crises. Then, and not till then, was his pen laid down, as a veteran lays by his sword. This was a rare experience, a fulness not often given to the sons of men, and it also sets him somewhat apart from common humanity. But it tells us what a human life should be, and sets before us an ideal. Amid their loss, this completeness of life brings a sacred and quiet joy to all who were nearest and dearest to him. It may also have given himself a gentle and well-earned pleasure as he drew near to the life to come. It ought to add to our inward happiness as we contemplate it; for he was our brother in the faith, the sympathiser with our lives, and the Shepherd of us all. It is true that we are not built to win his palm. Many of us are worn with life, baffled by circumstances, unable in the stress even to begin the things we projected in youth; only able, and that hardly, to do what lies before us. These cannot have the delight of completeness, but they thank God, with unselfish joy, that one of themselves has attained it. It is good indeed to think of it, admire it, and love the man who realised it. And it is still better to think that he, who never thought his work complete—that high and aspiring spirit—rejoices now, with infinite energies, in the vaster work God gives him in the illimitable universe of Love.

THE FEAR OF GOD AND THE SENSE OF SIN.

BY THE REV. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A.*

Having distinguished between wisdom, virtue, and goodness, Mr. Wicksteed defined a devout man as one who seeks, "not only to bring his life-purpose negatively and positively into relation with the life-purposes of others, but who also seeks to bring his conduct and his aspirations into harmony with the supreme underlying and over-arching power in whom we live and move and have our being," and added that if we are such, we love God, "because of His holiness and love, so that our hearts are unquiet within us until they rest in conscious communion with Him." He then proceeded as follows:—

Now, I hold that what we mean by the sense of sin is a consciousness that we have violated this supreme spiritual harmony. It may be closely or loosely connected with any sense of guilt as concerns our fellow-men, or any sense of recklessness or folly as concerns the ordering of our lives. But it is not this connection which constitutes its essential character. It is rather a sense of having disturbed or failed to establish a harmony between our own souls and the Supreme Being.

In studying the penitential literature of the world, we cannot fail to be impressed with the possibility of the sense of sin entirely apart from anything that we can recognise as personal or social wickedness or failure of duty. Agonised cries rise from souls conscious of some purely ceremonial omission or commission. The horror of "secret sins," that is to say, not "sins done in secret," but ceremonial pollutions unconsciously incurred, or the thought of having done on the Sabbath day that which, only because it was the Sabbath day, was for the time unlawful, may call forth notes of anguish which echo to the depths of the soul of him who bewails some breach of the moral law, but bewails it under its spiritual aspect. Wherever, then, there is the sense of having put our lives out of tune with the Most High, there is the sense of sin.

Now it has been the business of many religions, and of many forms of Christian religion, at once to stimulate and to assuage this sense of sin, and this, too, both in its material and in its ethical or spiritual aspects. Sometimes the whole weight of this terrible sanction has been brought to bear upon breaches of the ceremonial law. Men have been taught to assuage it by offering sacrifices to God or donations to his representatives. Or at other times, they have believed that their whole lives constitute one continuous breach of the ethical precepts of the Deity, have acknowledged their own impotence to restore the harmony thus violated, and have flung themselves upon the atoning sacrifice of Christ, or the forgiving and redeeming love of God. These and countless intermediate or divergent types and shades of doctrine, may be taken as illustrations of how religious systems (or the religious spirit not consciously formulated in any system) have attempted at once to stimulate and to assuage this awful sense of sin.

I think I shall hardly be mistaken in assuming that the majority of my hearers, while recognising a certain spiritual significance in the sense of sin wherever genuine, will be agreed in holding it to be amongst the most pathetic and the most deplorable of human experiences wherever it is completely dissociated from an ethically significant basis. That men should have suffered extremest anguish of soul in connection with deeds which had only an imagined or conventional significance is a truly terrible reflection. But while we admit that the sense of sin, unless associated with ethical feeling, is a phenomenon grievous to contemplate, we shall certainly not admit that the sense of sin is identical with the sense of direct or inferential guilt. The sense of sin may, indeed, be roused by a consciousness of moral delinquencies, or the sense of sinfulness by a consciousness of moral imperfections, and they may in their turn goad us to the most strenuous moral endeavour; but it is not in these things that they have their essence. A violation of truth, for example, or a violation of chastity may lay upon us a burden of moral guilt; but in addition to the wrong to individuals or to society, and beyond the reach of any act of atonement or compensation, is the sense of having put ourselves out of harmony with the Supreme Being, the sense of an aching wound or burn caused by no wrong done to our fellow-men (inexpressible as would be the relief, in many cases, could we be assured that no objective wrong had resulted), and medicable by no change in our relations to man.

Now, in my own youth, the deliberate cultivation of this sense of sin, or, in lack of any sense of definite sin, a sense of sinfulness, was a recognised religious duty.

The sense of sin, or of sinfulness, was in itself a spiritual grace. And in the Christian Church there are countless indications that this has been so in many, if not in all, periods. I need only mention the place occupied in the mediæval devotions by the penitential Psalms, the tone of the additions made by the Reformers to the English Prayer Book, and the pathetic yearning which runs through the ninth and tenth services of the Liturgy best known amongst ourselves.

Now, those of my generation have been accustomed to associate the deepest impressions of their early religious life, every crisis of their spiritual education, and much of whatsoever moral grit and fibre there may be in their composition, with this sense of sin, or sinfulness, cultivated as a spiritual grace.

We look about us, and we re-examine our own spiritual consciousness, and we are aware of a change which seems to amount to a revolution. It has been said, I know not on what authority, that many years before his death Mr. Gladstone was asked what he thought the greatest change that had taken place in his day in the religious life of England, and he answered: "The decay of the sense of sin." What is our attitude towards this change? I believe that most of us recognise it as a fact, and in our hearts greet it with a deep and sincere thankfulness, but also with a certain misgiving. Who can doubt or deny that in this elaborately cultivated religious depression there was something unwholesome, and that in itself it constituted both a drain upon vitality and a positive misery of dimensions not easily exaggerated? No wonder, then, that when we realise that it is disappearing we are conscious of an acknowledged or possibly a concealed relief. And yet, and yet! Can we dissociate what is most strenuous—nay, even what is most robust and exultant in our own moral and religious life from these terrible experiences?

In order to define more closely our attitude of mind in this matter, let us glance at some of the causes that have been at work in effecting the change.

I shall make no attempt at an exhaustive enumeration. To do so would be to attempt a complete spiritual history of the last fifty years. I can merely touch upon a few of the associated movements of thought which observation and reflection seem to indicate as immediately connected with the change in question.

To begin with, there is no branch of thought or of life which has not felt the transforming touch of the theory of evolution. How far that theory is really a new one we need not discuss. It has in any case become effective in a new sense within the memory of my generation. Philosophers and poets have said and sung in every system of thought and in every tone of passion and inspiration that evil is not positive but negative, and theologians have attempted to drive their teaching home. Nevertheless, the general consciousness of mankind has been too much for the insight of the philosopher, the inspiration of the poet, and the conviction of the theologian; and evil has been continuously regarded as a positive thing just as much as good. But the doctrine of evolution has at last effected a practical modification in men's ways of looking at the matter, and we have really come, to an appreciable extent, to regard evil as the rearguard at best, and the camp-following at worst, of good. Many things that our fathers looked upon with absolute and unqualified horror, wherever and whenever they appeared, we have learned to regard as natural and innocent in certain conditions and at certain stages of human progress, and undesirable rather than monstrous when they survive under conditions to which they are no longer appropriate. When pushed to optimistic extremes this doctrine is shallow and unsatisfactory to the last degree; but in its truth, as well as in its error, it has unquestionably served to modify, and in a sense to soften, our whole conception of evil, and therefore of sin. Much that we regarded as a flat violation of the divine harmony appeals to us now as a not inharmonious prelude to diviner strains. In all this there is manifest truth and insidious error; certain gain and not easily measured loss.

Again, the infusion of Pantheistic conceptions into our theism, though certainly no new thing in the Christian Church (dating as it does at least back to the influence of Greek speculations, or vaguer Oriental tendencies, upon the Hebrew tradition) has found a powerful ally in modern science. Taking a less spiritual tone than that under which it inspired some of the noblest products of mediæval thought, it has often blunted the sharpness of the sense of a personal relation to the Supreme Being, and has, therefore, blunted the sense of sin. And in this growing Pantheism, again, we cannot fail to note both gain and loss; an expansion of the spiritual horizon which is not only inevitable, but ennobling, together with the danger of a certain vagueness, a hiding under large and generous expressions of a poverty of spiritual concept.

Reinforcing both these tendencies, and allied with them both, is a keen sense of the fact that religious sanctions are very often superstitious survivals. Conduct which once could find its justification in real or supposed personal or social requirements, but is now no longer prescribed either by reason or by benevolence, is still enforced by the vague and terrible sanction of religion. Thus religion may distort, or positively pervert, the stress we lay upon our actions, making us strain at gnats while we swallow camels, or throwing a gratuitous blight and horror over life. Lucretius represents Epicurus as the greatest of the deliverers of mankind; because he found them cowering under the frowning brow that lowered upon them from the skies, robbing life of all its sweetness, and taught them to trample religion under foot, as it had once trampled them, and by his victory raised them to equal terms with heaven. And religion may not only depress life with its horror, but may positively oppose moral progress. We are, all of us, familiar with the thought of men whose moral ideals were so pure and high, and so strictly related to the actual requirements of life that they were regarded as sacrilegious rebels against the Deity by their religious contemporaries. And even in the heart of one and the same individual the growing moral life may be oppressed by religion. In Mark Twain's story the living human relationship, the ties of gratitude, affection and loyalty which bind the white boy to the black man are vital sources of moral conduct; and the tradition which makes the surrender of an escaped slave a social duty, has all the sanctions of religion. In the terrible struggle that goes on in the boy's mind his morality triumphs, but triumphs at the expense of setting his whole spiritual nature into an attitude of defiant rebellion, and making him really believe that Satan's motto "Evil, be thou my good," has become his own.

Those who are acutely sensible of this possibility of the religious sanctions being invoked in support of immoral and anti-social traditions, often suspect religion; and since they regard the sense of sin as rising out of the religious sense they regard it, too, with distrust, and think of it rather as a disease to be cured than as a grace to be cultivated. Moreover, they resent the idea of this terrible experience being deliberately exploited by religion. They believe that religion attempts to bring men to a sense of sin, not because it is a right state to be in, but because it is so terrible that by way of refuge from it men will rush into any haven that is offered to them, and so give religion its chance.

Very closely connected with the influence we have last examined is the bearing on our problem of the developed social sense which in recent times has modified so many of our ideas. A revolt against the spiritual individualism of many forms of Protestantism, and an indignant feeling that conventional respectability has been confounded with virtue, have combined with a generous social ardour to divert men's thoughts from the personal aspects of their own conduct, and from scrupulosity or severity with respect to offences that the respectable world condemns. "Look out, not in," they say. "Do not trouble about your soul, or about your sins. It draws you from large emotions into petty, self-centred, scrupulosity." Social enthusiasm and sympathy is to supersede self-discipline and self-accusation alike. On Shelley's lips this gospel reaches its highest and most convincing expression.

> "Reproach not thine own soul, but know thyself;
> Nor hate another's crime, nor loathe thine own.
> It is the dark idolatry of self
> Which, when our thoughts and actions once are gone,
> Demands that man should weep and bleed and groan;
> Oh vacant expiation!—Be at rest:
> The past is Death's, the future is thine own;
> And love and joy can make the foulest breast
> A paradise of flowers where peace might build her nest."

Now is it not a fact that as we pass all these tendencies in review we are conscious of a strange mingling of feelings? On the one hand we meet the breath of a frank and wholesome life, and rejoice to escape from a morbid and self-conscious tradition; but on the other hand we are aware of the danger of confusion and superficiality; we know how easy it is to give ourselves enervating dispensations under high-sounding titles; and we more than suspect that some attempt to escape the essential discipline and evade the awful seriousness of life has been infused into the somewhat light-hearted gospel of our day.

Can we make any advance towards disentangling these strands in the influences that have been at work in modifying or softening the old sense of sin? Can we learn to discriminate between the elements that we ought to welcome and those that we ought to resist in the new religious tendencies?

I believe the line along which we should attack the problem leads to an attempt to define the place that prohibition takes in developing opportunity. What place does shutting up possibilities occupy in the process of opening possibilities out?

We have passed (or are passing) through an experience in our management of public affairs that ought, I think, to give us a good deal of light. When, in the earlier part of this century, thinkers and statesmen came to realise how much harm had been done by regulation of industry and other forms of restrictive legislation, some of them came to regard the problems of government and administration as being susceptible of a very easy solution on the principle of simply letting people alone and not regulating or administering at all. At that time they did not carry the principle through, but they did enough to indicate both its strength and its weakness. They conferred great benefits upon the world, but they subjected their principles to illogical limitations in some cases while giving them disastrous application in others. But in more recent times the anarchists have advocated more consistent conduct. The political anarchist is not one who desires to abolish all order, but one who regards all government or ordering as the source not of order but of confusion, and who therefore wishes to abolish that. Auguste Comte has pointed out that the use of the one word order by the Western nations to signify at the same time "the issuing of a command" and "a state of due arrangement" shows how our consciousness declares the latter to be dependent on the former. This connection of the two senses of "order" is exactly what the anarchist denies. He believes that if authoritative orders were no longer issued, order would ensue.

I shall not attempt to refute the anarchist, but shall simply assume that most of us think that he is wrong, but that he has got hold of a principle that we must not neglect. We believe that our object must be to secure the greatest amount of freedom possible for men; but we believe that effective freedom is measured by the range of alternatives effectively open to men, and we believe that if certain courses are forbidden to certain individuals both they and other people will have a wider range of alternatives effectively open to them than if those courses were not forbidden to them. The protection of person and property — to the limited extent to which it at present exists in our own country, for instance —we believe increases our liberty, but it does so at the expense of restraining our liberty. Such restraint of liberty we accept, but only for the sake of greater liberty. We seek to minimise restraint and to keep it strictly subordinate to our purpose of enlarging opportunity; but we cannot eliminate it. Its function is secondary, but essential.

So, too, in the moral and religious world. Negation and prohibition must be subordinate to fruition; but they cannot be eliminated. Our moral and spiritual anarchists would have us believe that right conduct and right feeling would spontaneously assert themselves if only Moses would break the Tables of the Law once for all and never go up into the mountain again to have them replaced. "I was alive once without the Law," they say, "and if the Law with its desolating 'thou shalt not' had never been promulgated, sin would not have come to life, and I should not have died!" The spiritual, like the political and administrative anarchism, has its high value as a protest. The religion of the priests has always had too much of prohibitionin it, and the religion of the prophets has always been a Gospel—the announcement of glad tidings of great joy, of glorious possibilities and glorious realities.

It has opened to us a life of which we had not dreamed, and given us a joy we had not conceived. Its prohibitions are incidental, its opportunities are essential. And if I mistake not, the characteristic developments of the religious spirit in our day are entirely in this direction. The primary fact of our religion is not a sense of want but a sense of opportunity.

"Let him be rich and weary," George Herbert sang;

> "Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
> If goodness lead him not, yet weariness
> May toss him to my breast."

What does this teaching imply? Surely that to lie in the bosom of God is better than aught else, but that man would never see that it was so useless some bitterness were infused into earthly joy for the very purpose of making it unsatisfactory. Is not Tennyson's

> "We needs must love the highest when we see it" at once a nobler Gospel, and in far closer harmony with our own religious consciousness? We look, I think, more and more to the deep and permanent joy and beauty of life as our normal guides into the higher region of spiritual experience, and as furnishing our normal assurance of the love of God. The sorrow and weariness of life we look upon more and more as testing and sifting out the abiding and the worthy elements of our experience from the transient and ignoble, and therefore as leading us to God, not so much through that which they take away as through that which they leave. He is the most religious man, not who most despises life, but who most sees the grandeur of its opportunities; not who draws the sharpest contrast between the vanities of earth and the abiding glories of heaven, but to whom the breath of eternity has already transfigured the things of time, and whose guarantee for the future is found, not in the emptiness, but in the fulness, of the present. The Greek legend tells of two ways by which the deadly charm of the Siren's song was escaped. Ulysses stopped the ears of his followers with wax, and had himself bound to the mast of his ship. The Argonauts heard the song of Orpheus, sweeter than the song of the Sirens, and so escaped their witchery.

But our spiritual anarchists protest against the idea of there being any necessity of escaping the Sirens at all. Do not lay your own nature under the ban, they say; and do not be afraid of the gods, for they are friendly, not hostile powers; and life consists in growth and in experience, not in self-thwarting and renunciation. Under the very absurd name of "Hellenism," as opposed to "Hebraism," this dream of an escape from discipline, superseding the prohibitions of morality and religion, and making life spontaneously beautiful, has a certain platonic attraction for many souls that are far too robust and wholesome to be in any practical danger from it.

But in point of fact it comes into direct collision with the most fundamental condition of life; for life presents itself to us as a series of alternatives, and one alternative can only be realised by the suppression and renunciation of the other, and suppression and renunciation mean discipline, painful in a greater or smaller degree according to our dispositions and our circumstances, but in any case painful. Unless we are prepared to give up something that we want we can never have anything that we want, and unless we are prepared to go without what we want for the minute we shall lose what we most want for the hour.

Until we have definitely and conclusively accepted our limitations, and understood that to attain and to possess means to renounce, we have not learned the beginning of wisdom. Experiences are often mutually exclusive, and can no more occupy the same mind than two bodies can occupy the same space.

There are moments when the well-regulated and virtuous man, who for years has struggled, in the main successfully, against the besetting sins of those around him, turns with a sort of reproachfulness on himself and on Providence as though he had been defrauded of those experiences of life which in wise and deliberate scorn he has in fact rejected. What is all this save a rebellion against the fundamental condition of life, which prescribes that it shall be a choice between alternatives in which the taking of the one is the rejecting of the other? And yet it is by recognising, not by vainly fighting against this limitation, that we can most truly enlarge our experiences of life; for whether on the ranche, or in the study, or at the bar, or in the counting-house, or at the plough-tail, the man who "what he lives, lives well," by getting to the centre of life, has learned to bring its circumference under symmetrical view; whereas, he who hurries from point to point on its circumference, and fixes himself upon some excrescence, can never reach its centre. A true knowledge of life is to be gained not by bulk, but by intensity of experience; and he who has rejected unworthy alternatives and experiences has a fuller as well as a purer knowledge of what they are than he who has embraced them. Anselm declares that Eve's will to eat the apple and gain knowledge of good and evil was good in itself, but evil in that it ignored the conditions of its own fulfilment. She wished to be as the gods, but wished to be so at a time when God willed it not. The very knowledge and experience she sought would have come to her as a beautiful and innocent part of a fuller life, in its due place and with its due meaning had she waited for it. But because she would not renounce she could not obtain. The allegory is as universal as it is obvious.

And now we may return to our immediate subject, and draw our conclusions. Our habitual attitude must be that of working upward, not downward; forward to the light, not back upon the shadow. But to see the higher clearly, and to love it with the whole heart, is to condemn and to reject the lower; and to have seen the higher, and still to believe in it as the higher, though the appeal of the lower is at this moment more importunately felt, is to hear the command and the prohibition of the law, obedience to which in our hours of darkness is the condition upon which alone we can return to hours of insight.

We apprehend the religious life, then, as growing and glorious opportunity, privilege, fruition. Our dominant idea is not the fall, but the ascent of man. But, if we are found wanting to our opportunity and our privileges, the sense of discord between what we are and what we might be and ought to be is there, though the stress falls on the glory of the life open to us, rather than on the shame of neglected opportunity.

The sense of sin, then, is no longer cultivated as an inward grace, but neither must we seek to arm ourselves against its galling sting. Very real and very terrible it still must be, if we retain our spiritual and moral sensitiveness, and do not seek to cheat ourselves; but it will act as a stimulus to seize and develop the ever-open opportunities, and to enter the ever-open door. The anguish of repentance will speak in the longing, rising sometimes to fierceness in its intensity, to meet—not only in wanton self-exposure to temptation, but in the outward course of a progressively triumphant life—the foes that formerly daunted us or cast us down, so that in our turn we may triumph over them. We shall seek for purification by meeting and bearing the consequences of our failure or our sins, however painful, and shall hope for the final quenching of the fiery sting of their memory by dwelling, not in the realms of accusing self-consciousness, but in those of frank and grateful communion of thought and deed with all that is blest and wholesome. As long as every opportunity that is offered to us means the choice between a wiser and a more foolish, or a nobler and more ignoble alternative, we shall be liable to choose the worse—not in blindness, but in weakness or passion—then, to recognise our lost opportunity, to feel the actual discord emphasised by the ideal harmony, and to know the anguish of the sense of sin. And when this experience has been ours, we shall know the meaning of the fear of God. Not that fear which drives us in terror to divorce our actions from our affections—not the fear of God as of the Divine policeman who is always ready to bring the terrors of the law upon us; but the fear of God, which is hardly even another aspect of the love of Him. We see the beauty of holiness, we see the mark of our high calling in communion with Him, we see the greatness of the opportunities of life; and this is the love of God. And we know that if, in yielding to sloth or to passion, we neglect these opportunities, and are content with the lower and the baser part, that harmony which we now feel will have its counterpart in the discord which we shall wake in the hurt and miserable sense of sin. We know that we cannot escape, though we climb to the top of Carmel, or plunge into the depths of the sea; and this is the fear of God. It is the love of God which inspires our lives; it is the fear of God which protects us in our moments of weakness, when we love the part rather than the whole, and would find a momentary and local harmony at the expense of a permanent and universal discord.

Perfect love does, indeed, cast out fear; for if we loved God perfectly, we should love Him always, and sin would never tempt us. And, therefore, it is in the love of God that the formula of harmony must be sought. Even when conscious of our own sin, conscious of our self-alienation from God, and the discord that it has waked in our being, we must seek to feel the harmony above and below, that the sense of opportunity, of privilege, of glory, of God, may still dominate over the sense of failure, of exclusion, of shame, of self; that fear may be nought but an under agent of love, the sense of sin nought but an undertone in the sense of salvation.

OBITUARY.

JOSEPH DARE, B.A.

Mr. Joseph Dare, of whose death, at his residence in Wimbledon-park, on March 6, we have only recently heard, was the elder son of the Rev. Joseph Dare, a well-known highly respected minister to the poor at Leicester. A younger brother, the Rev. H. M. Dare, is the late minister of the Old Meeting, Sidmouth. Mr. Dare was one of the earliest students of Manchester New College, after its removal to University Hall, London, graduating B.A. of London University in 1857, after a three years' Arts' course at University College, and completing his Divinity course in 1860. His class-fellows of the same year were the Rev. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh; the late Rev. Percy Bakewell, of Warwick; and the Rev. George Heaviside, of Coventry. After leaving College Mr. Dare officiated in various places as an occasional "supply," but was never, we believe, settled as minister of a congregation. Feeling that he had a truer vocation for the Press than the pulpit, and could exercise as a journalist a wider influence than as a preacher, he became connected with the Standard newspaper as one of its foreign sub-editors, a post for which he was especially qualified on account of his knowledge of foreign languages; and after many years of arduous and honourable service, he retired about four years ago on a well-deserved pension. Mr. Dare was the English translator of Zeller's "Acts of the Apostles," in two volumes. He was, at the time of his death, in his sixty-fifth year.

LIFE, MORE AND FULLER.

We have completed in our present issue the report of the proceedings of the National Conference at Leicester, and are able now to look back upon the whole week, and to consider what it has given to us. Certainly it has given a renewed sense of happy fellowship and of strength in the service of a common cause; and when the report of the business meeting is considered, and the proposals made in the papers of Mr. Ellis and Mr. Arthur Worthington, it will be seen that we have good reason not to be discouraged, but with serious and steadfast purpose to keep a firm hold upon our work and to press forward into the open future.

The Committee of the Conference, which includes not only the twelve members elected at the meeting, but representatives of District Associations and other Societies throughout the country, is charged to take into consideration the important proposal of Mr. Ellis's paper, for the encouragement of Young People's Religious Societies, and the formation of a Union of such Societies. Bearing in mind the salutary cautions of Mr. Byles and Miss Edith Gittins, this proposal contains a promise of the utmost value for the future vitality of our churches.

The Committee is further charged to take into consideration the formation of a Board, the members of which shall be in touch with the life of our churches in different parts of the country, and shall be able to exercise a sympathetic oversight, in the way of advice and any needful act of helpfulness, over young men who may show an inclination towards the ministry, thus to secure more effectually than in the past that the right men shall not be lost to the ministry, and that they shall go up to College with the best possible preparation. This again, by deepening the sense of responsibility in the churches for the supply of the ministry, and giving it active expression, should be fruitful of the best results.

Of the need of a Superannuation Fund for Ministers there can be no question, and Mr. Cogan Conway's Committee has already devoted a large amount of time and care to the working out of a scheme; but the discussion at the Business Meeting showed that there is still much to be accomplished before the interests of those most concerned can be well adjusted, and a Fund established, that will command wide-spread sympathy and support. When the Committee have succeeded in bringing this undertaking to a happy issue, they will have rendered a service, the beneficent results of which will be felt not only by those whose burdens in the ministry will be appreciably lightened, but by those who, in establishing the Fund, have taken one more step in demonstration of their genuine loyalty to the service of our Free Churches, and their desire for a ministry worthy of the cause, freed from needless and harassing cares, to devote the whole of their energies to that high service.

It followed naturally from what had been said at the Conference, and still more from what had been deeply felt beyond the power of words, concerning Dr. Martineau, of what he had been and still is in the life of our churches, that the Committee should be further asked to consider in what way a permanent memorial to our great teacher could best be raised. Manchester College is happy in the possession of Watts's portrait, and Mr. Hope Pinker's incomparable statue; but as a religious community it is natural that we should desire something more, and best of all some form of memorial that shall remain intimately associated with the growing life of our churches. To such an end the suggestion of Martineau Scholarships for Willaston School seems to us a happy one; and we may be satisfied that with the strong and representative Committee of the Conference this and other suggestions are in the best hands to bring forward proposals worthy of him, who is to be commemorated, and as far as possible commensurate with the reverence, gratitude, and affection thus to be expressed.

These words are written on the eve of Easter, amid signs of the returning Spring. We are thankful to be able to include in our present number Mr. Stopford Brooke's beautiful memorial address, in which we value especially those words concerning the wonderful completeness of Dr. Martineau's life, and the manner in which out of the stress of intellectual and moral warfare, he came "more and more to abide in the world of the Spirit, closer and closer to the everlasting peace and love, so that his life reached fulness of being." That is what remains with us as a benediction on our life, in undying fellowship of spirit, that we may be of a good courage, and with reverent thankfulness go forward upon our way.

"THEY HAVE TAKEN AWAY MY LORD."

"Why weepest thou, woman?" they say,
Because they have taken my Lord—
O Sir hast thou borne him away?
I pine and I droop for his word,
O hearken and tell me I pray—
They have taken away my Lord.

On some high inaccessible throne,
There they have seated my Lord.
I cannot now call him my own,
I listen in vain for his word—
To a high inaccessible throne
They have taken away my Lord.

O Jesus, come down to us here,
With the sweetness of love that can stoop,
The love that will banish all fear,
For thy little ones tremble and droop—
O Jesus come down to us here,
With the sweetness of love that will stoop.

He is leaving his throne in the skies!
He is coming! O vision divine!
I shall gaze in his pitying eyes,
I shall greet him my Saviour: Yes, mine.
Rabboni! He answers—"Arise!"
"I have loved thee, O soul, I am thine."

Clement Pike.

The Messiah Pulpit, of March 9, contains a sermon by the Rev. Robert Collyer on Dr. Martineau, preached in New York. It was in May, 1871, when Mr. Collyer preached in Essex-street Chapel the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, that he first saw Dr. Martineau, and of this he says in the memorial sermon:—

There for the first time I saw the face and heard the voice of our "James, a servant of God"—the voice so soft and clear, but by no means loud, reminding you of the voice of our own Orville Dewey.

Mr. Collyer also preached for Dr. Martineau at Little Portland-street, and adds:—

I sat with him one sunny morning in his library through some happy hours—happy, that is, to me. I remember also saying with regret, when we parted, "I would so love to hear you preach, sir, but shall not be able." "Well," he answered, "we will do the next best thing or perhaps the better. I will give you a sermon I have not printed." The serman was burnt in the great fire in Chicago a month after we came home, with most of my own. This was the first time I came in touch with our great and good apostle, and the memory is clear almost as when I left him that day. He was then well turned the sixty years of age, but his eyes were not dim or his natural strength abated. They were the seer's eyes, blue shot through with grey, keen some moments as the glance of an eagle, and steadfast as the stars—a man still in the fair latter summer of our life.

Mr. Collyer tells of a second visit, in the summer before last, when Dr. Martineau recalled some happy memories of his student days at York, and his preaching in the villages round about; and then the sermon recounts, with the preacher's well-known happy touches, the chief points in Dr. Martineau's life.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE AT LEICESTER.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

On Thursday morning, April 5, the devotional service at ten o'clock was conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., after which the chair was taken by Mr. Charles W. Jones, and two papers were read, the first by the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A., on "The Fear of God and the Sense of Sin," the second by Mrs. Humphry Ward, on "Gospel Interpretation—a Specimen Chapter." Mrs. Ward's paper, we understand, will shortly be published in one of the magazines. The greater part of Mr. Wicksteed's paper will be found on an earlier page.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After lunch the business meeting was held in the Temperance Hall. The President, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, took the chair, and in opening the proceedings, said that there was one resolution which must take precedence of all other business, a resolution concerning their great leader, Dr. Martineau.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal then moved :—

The National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing or kindred congregations, assembled at Leicester in its seventh meeting, records its grateful appreciation of the exceptional services which the Rev. J. Martineau, LL.D., S.T.D., D.D., D.C.L., and Litt. D., during his long life has rendered by deepening the faith and widening the love which the congregations forming the Conference exist to cherish and sustain.

In an age of materialistic and utilitarian thought he has upheld an unselfish morality, and has been the unconquered Champion of Christian Theism, guarding the sure foundation on which the Universal Church is built and training men and women for the noble work to which he consecrated his lengthened years.

The Conference remembers with especial thanks the address in which at Leeds Dr. Martineau explained his plan of organisation, and the patient forbearance with which he met the criticism of its details in Committee. Although the proposals which he framed and expounded have not been fully adopted, they have borne good fruit and greatly promoted closer fellowship among the Free Churches.

The congregations represented in the Conference and the whole Christian Church on earth are poorer by Dr. Martineau's entrance into the unseen communion, and mourn their loss. But the Conference is thankful that the unnumbered tributes offered to Dr. Martineau's memory reveal a unity of spirit underlying the most varied Creeds, and show that his work has not been in vain, and make the Conference believe that in the world where all is made plain he sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied.

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Mr. Basil Martineau and Miss Martineau, with the expression of the Conference's sincerest and most respectful sympathy.

That resolution, he said, could not tell one tithe of what they owed to Dr. Martineau; its wording had been carefully limited to the debt owed by the Conference. Dr. Martineau's old pupils knew most of all how much had been taken from them, remembering especially how when they went to him privately with their difficulties and wants, they received a revelation of the wondrous insight he had into the working of the human mind, and of every quality that moved the soul to high and elevated thought. Those who in sorrow and trouble came near to him knew that clear as was his intelligence, bright as was his genius, there was something more precious still, and that was the tenderness of his loving heart. They had lost a friend whom it would be impossible to replace.

As to the work Dr. Martineau did for that Conference, his speech at Leeds had laid out a plan of organisation, which had not been carried out, and it was doubtless a disappointment to him that his proposals were not more generally adopted; but it was now seen how that plan had its weight and influence on the community, and his commanding influence was felt in the bond of union, which now united their congregations more closely than ever before. In the meetings of the Committee which followed the Leeds Conference, dealing with the details of his plans, they had learnt to reverence the patience and self-command he displayed as criticism after criticism was brought up, and met by him with a kindly courage they could never forget. It was an example to younger men to see how greatness and modesty could be combined, with such wondrous grace.

The Rev. L. P. Jacks, in seconding the resolution, expressed his great regret that Mr. Armstrong, who was to have undertaken that duty, was unable to be present. Speaking of Dr. Martineau's leadership, he said that not even Newman or Wesley was ever followed with greater love and devotion, or trusted with a confidence more entire. That fact had had a most marked and beneficial effect on the life of their churches. Lacking as they were in external organisation, endlessly diversified in opinion, they had nevertheless been drawn to hold together in a common union of hearts by the admission of his leadership, as the man who represented all that was best in the movement to which they all belonged. And now that he was taken from them, they might hope that, as had been repeatedly the case in history, the memory and the traditions of that great personality would become even more powerful as a cementing force among them. The full story of his work was not told when they recited what he did by his philosophy and teaching. In the regard of many of them he stood not only as a great teacher, but as a noble character, an almost completed type of personality, a man who had grown up, as far as it was possible to grow up under human limitations, into the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. For himself he had always felt that a religious movement which had produced James Martineau, a set of religious influences which had ended in him, a type of doctrine which had lent itself to the formation of such a soul as he, that movement, that religion, that doctrine must have come forth from God. That, he thought, was a feeling they all shared.

The resolution was passed in reverent silence, and Mr. Steinthal further moved, Mr. Jacks seconded, and it was agreed :—

That it be an instruction to the Committee to be elected to-day to consider the advisability of commemorating our great teacher and leader, and to take the steps needful to secure the attainment of the object if a suitable plan be agreed upon.

The President then moved, and Mr. William Long seconded, the adoption of the Committee's report.

The report, which was the first presented to the Conference, narrated the history of the Conference from the first meeting in 1882, and traced the steps by which it had come to be representative of the churches, with certain executive powers. It was pointed out that the time had come for the adoption of more definite rules, and that it would be necessary to secure a reliable income. Reference was also made to the loss sustained in the death of Dr. Martineau, and also to the death of three members of the Committee, Mr. Herbert Bramley, Mr. J. S. Mathers, and the Rev. R. Spears.

The rules of the Conference having been adopted, the President, in the Treasurer's absence, presented the financial statement. The work of the Conference, he said, was growing, and the time would come when they would wish to visit towns which could not bear the cost of entertainment, which the large towns had borne, and which Leicester had provided in such a generous manner. They had decided also once more to print a separate report of their proceedings. The treasurer had asked for £300, and had received £210, but they were trusting that the remaining £90 would be forthcoming, and indeed they must have it.

On the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter was elected president, and he expressed his thanks to the Conference. Messrs. J. R. Beard and W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., were elected vice-presidents. The twelve members of the Committee elected by the Conference (as announced on the following morning) were: Miss Florence Hill, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, W. H. Drummond, F. K. Freeston, C. Hargrove, Dr. Brooke Herford, J. C. Street, and Joseph Wood, Messrs. E. Clephan, J. Cogan Conway, H. P. Greg, and Grosvenor Talbot.

On the motion of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, seconded by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the cordial thanks of the Conference were given to the Leicester Committee for their hospitable arrangements, both speakers referring in the warmest terms to the excellence of the arrangements and the great kindness shown not only by the members of the two congregations, but by members of other Nonconformist bodies and the Church of England in the matter of hospitality.

Mr. E. Clephan, in responding, acknowledged their great indebtedness to members of other bodies in the town, and spoke of the enthusiasm with which the younger members of their own churches had thrown themselves into the work of preparing for the Conference.

Mr. J. Cogan Conway then presented the report on the superannuation of ministers, which was printed in The Inquirer of March 31. In moving the adoption of the report, he explained its main features, as securing insurance in a well-established society, and pointed out that if the report were adopted it would mean that the Conference was pledged to the raising of an income of at least £600 a year or a capital sum of £20,000. It must be regarded not as an act of benevolence, but as providing for ministers a part of that adequate support which was their due.

Mr. David Martineau, in seconding the adoption of the report, said that on the whole the scheme had been very favourably received by the ministers concerned. It had indeed been suggested that they were beginning at the wrong end, and that they ought to pay larger salaries. He would be very glad if it were possible for congregations to do so, but it could not be done by any public body, without the danger of sapping the independence of congregations; and he thought they were beginning at the right end, in that they were calling upon ministers to do something for themselves while assisting them to obtain valuable securities for their families and for themselves. He then proceeded to meet various objections to the scheme, and concluded by saying that if it were adopted, they would have to go to a careful actuary and be sure of their figures.

Various questions having been asked and answered, the Rev. J. C. Street, speaking on behalf of the Ministers' Benevolent Society, pointed out that his society, being purely benevolent in character, could not take part in any insurance scheme. They had a large number of members, and they had never failed to meet the needs of their members, paying much larger annuities than was proposed under the superannuation scheme. They had recently received large accessions to their funds, and were considering an extension of their activities and an increase of benefits. Ministers who had not done so would therefore be wise to join that society. At the same time, if there was anything they could do to help on the other scheme they would be glad to do so.

After some further discussion, the report was adopted, and on the motion of the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, seconded by Mr. Frank Taylor, a Committee was appointed to curry out the scheme, with any modifications found advisable, and to take steps to raise the necessary funds. The Committee was as follows:—The Rev. J. E. Carpenter, Messrs. F. Taylor, D. Ainsworth, P. J. Worsley, C. Fenton, W. B. Odgers, Q.C., the Revs. C. C. Coe, J. C. Street, W. G. Tarrant, and Joseph Wood, Messrs. H. Chatfeild Clarke, A. W. Worthington, D. Martineau, and J. Cogan Conway; with power to add to their number.

The meeting then terminated.

THE EVENING MEETING.

A very successful public meeting was held in the Temperance Hall in the evening. The President (Dr. Blake Odgers) was in the chair, and was supported, among others, by the Mayor of Leicester. Mr. F. Maddison, M.P., who had been announced as one of the speakers, was unfortunately prevented from being present, as he was obliged to remain in the House of Commons for the second reading of the Railway Accidents Bill. In his letter of apology, he said:—

> I had been looking forward to the meeting with much pleasure, as I esteem it a privilege to be able to testify in a public manner to the value to me of the simple but grand faith in God held by Unitarians—a faith which satisfies my spiritual needs without doing violence to my reason.

The Chairman, after the hymn "God of Ages and of Nations" had been sung, referred to the telegram which had been sent from their morning meeting to the Queen in Ireland, expressing sorrow at the attempt which had been made on the life of the Prince of Wales, and thankfulness for his escape. To that message a gracious reply had been received. He then spoke of the character of that Conference, with its long name, for which they had in vain tried to find a shorter. By "Unitarian" he understood a Christian who believed in God. Some would define it by the negative, as one who did not believe in the Trinity, but he preferred the affirmative form, and the essence of Unitarianism he held to be the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. "Liberal Christian and Free Christian" meant the same. "Presbyterian," which was the name still attached to some of their chapels, had an historical significance. The English Presbyterians had taken part in resisting Charles I. and Archbishop Laud, but subsequently had arrived at a purely congregational system of church government. They had now their District Associations and Missionary Societies, but each congregation was absolutely independent. "Non-subscribing" implied the old undogmatic principle, by which they had been enabled to make their progress in religious thought. Thus they were now in a position to go forward, holding strongly to their own convictions, and free to welcome truth from every side. They looked forward to more light and progress, determined to hold fast to the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free.

The Rev. J. Page Hopps then spoke on "Our Rights and Duties in Relation to the Church of England." The National Church, he affirmed, belonged to the nation, and as a citizen he had a right to a place in it. Recently he had been called upon to conduct a funeral service in a parish churchyard, and with the consent of the rector had used the church itself; and he asked, why that might not be extended further? As rational religionists, what were their rights and duties in regard to the National Church? Their rights as citizens came first; then as persons specially interested in religion, which meant brotherhood, they must see that the present condition of things in the National Church was undesirable. As to duties, they were bound to see that the best possible use was made of that great influential national institution. The ecclesiastical and priestly ring ought to be broken up. Mr. G. W. E. Russell, a good layman, had laid it down that the ideal of the Church was centred in the sacramentalism of the present extreme High Church party; but the Church of England must not be handed over to that party. In looking to the future, he should regard Disestablishment as a coarse and wasteful alternative. It would mean, under present conditions, handing over the Church to the ecclesiastical, Catholic ring, freed from the nation's control. That would be throwing away one of the finest institutions of the country. What they ought to do, first of all, was to get rid of the Act or Acts of Uniformity. Then he would abolish the powers of the parish and centre those powers in the congregation; and he would give any congregation under certain conditions power to elect itself into the National Church, so that the Great Meeting congregation, if they thought fit, could return to the Church from which their founders had been obliged to separate themselves. The whole of the funds of the Church should be administered by a State department, chiefly through local Boards, composed of layman. That would largely settle the question of inequality, atrophy in one place and repletion in another, and it would put the nation in possession of its own Church. In country places there might be difficulties, but in towns the process of natural selection would get over them, different congregations meeting different needs. Thus there would be a real unity through freedom, instead of a sham unity through enforced uniformity. As the old Universities had now been opened to the whole nation, so the Church ought to be opened; and they would be rid of a scandalous anachronism, which was a survival of the old days when the State thought it had a right to compel people to worship, think, pray, and believe in its way and not their own. He did not believe in any of the schemes of reformers that had been put forward, because they did not open the doors to the national conscience and reason. The Church was a splendid national asset; and they must insist that if Catholic priests might be in it, English reformers should be in it. In this matter they should use Tennyson's rallying cry, first used for another field of struggle, "Britons, hold your own!"

The Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein gave an address on "The Relation of our Free Churches to Positive Orthodoxy and to Modern Science." Their relation to orthodoxy, he said, did not involve any wilful antagonism. Just as the Protestant Churches in the sixteenth century had been driven, not by wilful antagonism to the pre-Reformation Church, but by their reading of the Bible and the principle of private interpretation and the study of history, so they had been led to certain conclusions as to doctrine, and as to the history and development of Christianity. What they represented was simply a wider expansion owing to the possession of larger freedom. There was no antagonism, but the working on a line of development. The Reformers of the sixteenth century had been engaged in a great quarrel with the head of the Church, and they left the Bible untouched, taking it from the Church, as the supreme authority, even while they denied the authority of the Church, which had made that claim for the Book. It was a case similar to that of the false Decretals, by means of which the authority of the Roman Pontiffs had been so widely extended. The time came when the Decretals were proved to be forgeries, and could no longer be defended by the Church of Rome, but the conclusions which had been drawn from those forged documents, and incorporated in canon law, were still maintained. So the Protestant Churches maintained the infallible authority of the Bible, even when they had proved the claims of the Old Church to be false, by which that authority had been maintained. He was thankful to belong to a Church which had abandoned that view of the Bible, and no longer maintained the doctrine of verbal inspiration. They did not believe that God had spoken in that way to man, but more than ever, in presence of all they knew, in presence of the revelation of God in Nature and in the heart of man, they believed in a divine revelation. They had been free to work in the light of knowledge, free from narrow views about God, and false ideas about man, and painful ideas about the salvation of some and the damnation of many. Using those same scriptures, they had worked their way back; and it had not taken away their Christianity or separated them from Christ, or made them less religious. It had brought them into closer connection with Jesus, they felt that they were brought nearer and nearer to the glorious conception of that life which was to them, children of earth, the direct expression of love divine. And while they were thus engaged in trying to strengthen the religious element within them, and to see where the principle of authority was actually to be found, they had also in their Free Churches relations to the growing knowledge, which dealt simply with facts, and was called modern science. In a marvellous way modern science had enlarged their human vision, giving not only correct ideas about things, but truer views of man and of the unity of the human race. "Revelation is not closed" they said; while it had been wonderful in the past, they looked forward to a future that might be more wonderful still. The astonishing progress made in recent years in the knowledge of geology and of astronomy showed what might be accomplished, and he looked forward to the progress of national education, which was the most vital question of the day, to lead them step by step to fuller knowledge, and that they might go on from faith to faith. Progress in science would not give them all they wanted. There was an order of intuition that came not from theology, not from science, but from the human heart, which God Himself had made, and in which He worked and dwelt; thence came the belief in goodness, in spite of all suffering and evil, and the faith so admirably reflected in such a poet, he had almost said such a prophet, as Robert Browning, when he said, "God's in his heaven." In that faith of the human heart they had a principle of unity, which would draw the members of different religious communities nearer and nearer together, and while the Chairman had seemed inclined to shorten the name of their Conference, it was his ambition to lengthen it, to add the names of others, who by other paths had found their way to the truth, until the name became so hopeless that it would have to be suppressed altogether, and one name would remain—the Church of God and of the Unity of Man.

The Rev. Joseph Wood said that at so late an hour he would put his speech in his pocket, and could only give an outline of what he had meant to say on "The Relation of our Free Churches to the Unattached." Many of those people were deserving of their highest respect. They lived noble, blameless lives, active in the service of social advancement. They were what a great Bishop had once called "public souls." They suffered loss by their estrangement from the one great paramount organisation of Christendom, and their Churches suffered loss by the absence of men, who could do so much to enrich their life, and could add new thought and new enterprise to their work. If they joined the Churches they might gain something of moral vision, but the Churches also would gain in moral discernment. Their message to such men was that after all that science and criticism had done, the fundamental things of religion remained; God and the spiritual facts of human nature remained—facts as real as those of geology and chemistry, facts of the soul, the soul's shame and sin, and sorrow, and aspirations. Those were facts no man ought to ignore, and above all they should face the greatest fact of all, which they found in the adorable thought of God. They must show that the Church exists to cure the present sins and sorrows of the world, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, and bring in the acceptable year of the Lord. If such a Church could be found, devoted heart and soul to human service, a Church in which greed and envy, and cruelty and selfish competition found hearts hot with indignation and feet swift to redress all wrong, a Church in which all its members went forth in the service of humanity, then he believed men and women would rise up and leave the ranks of the unattached and would say, "Whither thou goest we will go; thy people shall be our people, and thy God shall be our God."

The hymn, "Father, let Thy Kingdom come," and the Benediction, brought the meeting to a close.

FRIDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The devotional service on Friday morning was conducted by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., after which the chair was taken by Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, and the following paper was read by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A.:—

THE CONDUCT OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

My subject is "The Conduct of Public Worship." Public worship! The very phrase, were we not so familiar with it, would suggest an incongruity. Public worship! Consider what worship is, think of the "inwardness" which is the very life and meaning of the act, and surely no two things can be more alien to one another than publicity and worship. The highest worship is buried in silence and covered with invisibility. Privacy must be granted before it can be. It must enter into its chamber and shut the door. It is a secret between the soul and God. Dragged into the common daylight, it dies. Published in a newspaper article, enlarged on in a sermon, thrust forward in a public prayer—and the effect is to send a shudder through the soul.

If worship is to be made public without injury to its nature, certain conditions must be observed. We must not rashly open the door upon an act which seems to require, above all things, that the door should be shut. I submit that as we seek to understand how the act of worship may be most fittingly performed in public, what language it shall use, what forms it shall take, the two facts which force themselves on our attention as primary essentials are reserve and restraint. All kinds of worship may not be published. He who conducts public worship must therefore discriminate. All that we can hope to learn concerning the conduct of it depends on our understanding what aspect of religion it is which craves publicity and what aspect it is which shuns publicity as an absolutely uncongenial condition.

In saying this I shall, perhaps, seem to some to be saying the very opposite of what the facts require. Is it not a common complaint against our public worship that it is already too cold, too dull, too sad? And what could be the effect of a greater reserve than to make it still colder and more joyless. Is not our first requirement rather for a greater prophetic outpouring both in sermon and in prayer? Well, there is a great deal of outpouring about a sky-rocket, but very little heat. The fires which melt the rocks are subterranean, and are held under restraint. And I imagine that spoken words never burn so deep and light so far as when they reserve their hottest fire. At all events I am going to plead for that prophetic reserve which precedes and is essential to the prophetic outpouring. I think that this very coldness which is here complained of is partly due, at least, to dwelling overmuch on those aspects of religion which are not adapted to public worship, and from neglecting those which are.

There is one fact of transcendent importance in life which makes public worship a necessity. It is the brotherhood of man, or, if you like, the solidarity of the race. First in order among the facts of life is the link that binds the individual to God: therein lies the source of all private devotion. Next in order comes the fact of an infinite web of links which bind men in God to one another: therein lies the source of public worship. The whole matter under consideration this morning turns upon the observance of that distinction. Publicity is for those aspects of religion which spring from the oneness, the linkage, the connectedness of humanity in God. It is from this fact of human linkage that the moral law arises, and behind it the knowledge of the Love of God. The education of the conscience is but another name for the vitalising of the link that binds a man to his fellows. It is by going out along the links, so to speak, that men find their souls by losing them, and so win an attitude of mind which finds reality in eternal things. Connected with this fact of linkage, and growing out of it, is a vast range of truths, all of the first importance, a whole world of emotions and aspirations which crave public utterance, and which gain both in force and precision by being publicly expressed. From them true public worship never permits itself to be separated. Its language is of truths and of states of feeling in which all men share or can be made to share; its forms such that the togetherness of men past present and future is never lost sight of.

In the religious utterance of Christ, as recorded by the synoptics, we have a perfect example of the reserve in which the fact of personal communion with God requires to be held. It is everywhere implied, but nowhere avowedly exhibited. If "back to Jesus" is to be the religious motto of the present age it means, among other things, that the public expression of religion must become once more simple, objective, universal, and joyous.

Something impersonal therefore belongs to its very essence. It stands in sharp contrast to private devotion, the essence of which lies in its personal character. There the soul may indulge its egotism without fear of rebuke. When the door is shut, there need be only two beings in the universe, this individual soul and God. In that relationship I can never cease to be I: it is because I am I that I shut the door or go alone into the mountains to pray. But in public "I" is nothing nor nobody.

Both in private and in public worship the same definition of God is accepted—namely, that God is love. But in each case the truth is seized from a different point of view. In private it means what cannot be expressed, and what no attempt ought to be made to express, because such an attempt while on the one hand it will lead to the elucidation of nothing, will merely seem to tear the veil from the sacred reserve of the soul—a thing to which no man can be exposed without suffering and offence. But in public the love which God is comes before us in a thousand forms, which can be rendered articulate. It is the force which vitalises the links that bind men together, and which in so binding them creates duty and socialises life: it is the force which has evoked the present life of man out of his past, and will evoke the future out of the present; and in which every human life, that ever was, is or will be, becomes part of one universal Church. This is but one truth out of a million round which there gathers the speech of a common religion.

All that binds man to nature, all that gives rise to his duty, all that makes the world interesting and awful, all that leads up to and reminds him of the necessity of death, all that makes leadership his chief necessity, and obedience his chief strength—all this is part of that common religion which belongs to all in general because it belongs to none in particular, and supplies an endless theme for the aspiration of public prayer.

And the public worship that is based on this side of religion will strengthen the facts from which it springs. It will become a chief factor in maintaining the togetherness of humanity—knitting up the broken links, strengthening those that exist, and unfolding those finer implications of love and duty in which ever new links are to be found. And who that has read the Fourth Gospel needs to be told that whoever draws men nearer to one another draws them also nearer to God!

Friends and brother ministers, as throwing light on my point of view, and for that reason only, I have to confess to what some of you may think a weakness. I am one, and I think one of a great multitude, who shrink from the sight and hearing of those pietist exercises which express private devotion. I could never listen to any public account of private religious experience, whether in prayer or otherwise, without every drop of blood in my body crying out for silence. One has heard in public worship the violent expressions of self-abasement which, however true they might be for the speaker, could not possibly be shared by a miscellaneous multitude of persons. One has heard expressions of a contrary frame of mind which were equally peculiar. One has heard phrases used which attribute a mysticism to the congregation, which no congregation could take to itself. I submit that the agonies of the soul, whether they take the form of contrition or of rapture, are not for the public eye or ear. They are for Gethsemane. Its mystical moods are for the closed chamber or the mountain top. They cannot exist, and they ought not to be spoken in the presence of a cloud of witnesses. And yet what is a Church if you leave the cloud of witnesses out of account?

Standing on the ground thus far defined, I would contend, first, that public worship ought to be the integrating factor in our Church life, secondly that it should be a link of connection in our wider relationships with Christendom. Let us take for a moment what I must call the denominational point of view. May we, or may we not, take to ourselves the words "ye being many are one"? I think we may. Were we not one, how could this Conference exist? Beneath the strange variety of individualities we embrace, the assertion of which is obstinate enough, there is, and must be, a deeper unity. The fact that we are many may very well be left to look after itself: but the fact that we are one in a deeper sense waits for expression. It waits to be moulded into human speech. How can that be achieved? Never, I venture to say, by a creed. Unity of opinion there is not; but unity of aspiration there surely is. We have among us as many differing minds as there are differing individuals; but I believe that this diversity of minds is animated by a unity of will. All of us will to make a better world, and to lead better lives. All of us will to believe true the noblest things that can be said about the universe in which we live. All of us will to have Righteousness and Love at the helm of the world. Before us and above us lie common objects of hope and desire on which all eyes converge. Give them language, mould them into speech, and what form will your utterance take? It will take the form of universal prayer, mingled, as all prayer is, with praise. In the very act of expressing those focal points of all desire, you will have created public worship. But more than that. You will have given a common consciousness to the Church. You will have founded what at present does not exist among us in the large sense—namely, Church Life. You will have given form and substance to that impersonal religion which draws men together into the unity of congregations, and which is no less needful to the soul than is the personal religion which sends man alone into the mountains to pray.

But were nothing to be urged in this connection but the growth of a new Church Life as among ourselves, the very narrowness of the conception would vitiate the plea. I plead for a public worship which shall be an integrating factor not only among ourselves, but in our wider relations with Christendom, or if you will, with all worshipping souls. Public worship must represent the solidarity of the race. It must speak for the brotherhood of man. And it cannot have this universal character if its language is the language of the present alone. To be universal it must be historical. There is nothing in which the unity of men asserts itself so strongly as in revealing the common origin of its hopes, its fears, its faiths. A public worship which is merely of the present is no public worship at all. Everything we hope for or believe in is the fruit not of our private thinking, but of the experience of the race. It is a possession of the ages. No isolated individual could ever learn to believe in an Infinite and Eternal God. No generation of men cut off from these historical antecedents could understand the barest elements of Christian truth. These faiths of ours, be they of this kind or that, are links whereby our best selves are bound to the deepest life of uncounted generations of the past. It is impossible to express them in language in which that fact is overlooked. When religion forgets her character as the child of history, she loses her meaning altogether. We may render her thus meaningless in two ways. We may borrow our religious vocabulary exclusively from the past, say from the fourth century. That mistake we are not likely to commit. Or we may treat the whole past as a field of error, and refuse to give the name of light to anything which is not shining now. To this we are sometimes tempted, and it is doubly wrong. First, it overlooks the fact that in the twinkling of an eye we, too, shall be numbered with the past: therefore by our own act we are prospectively condemned as the children of the darkness. He who despises the past will in turn be dsepised by the future. Secondly, the religious language, which is merely the language of the present, is bound to be untrue. Veracity of religious expression does not mean mere accord with the science or philosophy of the present moment. Remember, I pray you, the distinction between public and private prayer. He who enters his closet and shuts the door is the individual—a being all alone except for the fact that the Father is with him. But that which a man brings in his heart when he comes to public worship, that which he lifts up in public prayer is the spirit of his race, and the language which speaks for that spirit must be language which the race has created and used. One of the deepest mysteries of life, and yet one of its plainest facts, is that every individual man of us is a re-incarnation of the whole past of humanity, bearing within him elements of life, perhaps even souls, or at any rate fragments of souls, which have lived for thousands of years, which were contemporary with Jesus, Paul, Augustine, Dante, Luther and Milton, all combined together into that larger self whose eyes are turned upon God; and I believe that effort to get out of the present into the timeless life of this larger self is the very noblest exercise of the human spirit. It is the highest duty of public worship to recognise this plain but mysterious fact of human nature, to meet its demands, to speak its language, to revive its memories, and to frame its aspirations. And that can only be through the use of historical language and to some extent by the retention of historical forms. And as the first and simplest way of doing this I would plead for the continued use of the Bible, both as the source of what are called lessons, and for the general supply of our religious vocabulary. There are many other reasons for this practice besides the one I have adduced. I would merely meet the argument of those who, taking the modern view of the Bible, as only one among the religious literatures of the world and to be judged on principles applicable to any other book, conclude from this that it ought no longer to occupy its present place in our religious exercises. Should such a person charge me with reading the Bible in public not because its words were always wiser or holier than those of any other book, but mainly for association's sake, I should at once admit the charge. But what then? Association in this connection is a word of vital significance. It is the profoundest justification that could be given for the practice. Association, I am firmly convinced, is the breath of the nostrils of public worship. Do away with association and you will kill that aspect of religion altogether. No doubt there are some passages in Carlyle that are wiser, some passages in Martineau that are more spiritual than some which are to be found in the Bible. But for my part the less wise passage in the Bible with its associations is a greater religious treasure than the more wise passage from Sartor without them. It is impossible to overestimate the value of associations in public worship. They are a means to that impersonality which, I confess, seems to me to belong to the very essence of the act.

In this connection we should, I think, make clear to ourselves why the practice of reading lessons is maintained at all. It began, of course, when the Bible was regarded as the exclusive source of revelation. Under that view the reasons for it are obvious. Those reasons have passed away. What others have taken their place? Are lessons read merely for the sake of the moral or religious instruction they contain, taken on its own merits? But that surely is the place which the sermon is intended to fill. To introduce two snippets of edification into the midst of prayer and praise is to needlessly anticipate an occasion for which a good half-hour has been specially reserved at the end. It is an act of disorder. Besides, it breaks up the organic unity of the worship; it calls for a sudden and violent change in the attitude of mind; and the more obtrusively edifying the lessons are, which is the case with all passages selected from modern authors, the more inappropriate is the reading of them at that particular moment of the service. The man who suddenly calls me away from the region of prayer to listen to the eloquence of Ruskin, or the wisdom of Emerson, or the quaintness of a Buddhist Sutta—who at one moment is using language which makes me one with the impersonal hopes and faiths of humanity, and in the next is reading out certain views or sentiments which reek with the personality of George Eliot or Walt Whitman, and which challenge agreement or disagreement—that man commits an offence against the spirit of the time. The time for edification does not arrive till the time for worship is done. Therefore, I contend that if lessons be read at all they must be read as a part of the act of worship, not as an offer of wisdom at a moment when wisdom is not what the soul is asking for. And the Bible is the only book which comes near to the fulfilment of these conditions. For us it is the most impersonal of all books. The reading of its chapters is a grand and solemn reminder of the rock whence we are hewn and the hole of the pit whence we are digged. And as such it is consonant with the spirit of worship. It makes the worshippers one in the sense of their common root. It expresses a common consciousness. It revives the memories of the race. It abounds with great words to which time has given a universal meaning. There may be exceptions, but as a rule extra-biblical lessons play the opposite part—that of disintegrating factors.

I contend, then, that public worship is by its nature the act of a community. All that fosters the spirit of individualism is a hindrance to the right conducting of it. All that revives a common consciousness is a help. There are two points round which this common consciousness chiefly centres. One is the sense of a common destiny; this expresses itself by the language of aspiration. The other is the sense of a common origin; this expresses itself by the language of history, in which for us the Person and Teaching of Christ, and the words of the Bible generally, will always have a prominent place. The one is the point of union whence the lines diverge; the other is that into which they converge again. Both points are intimately related to the sense of God, as the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the Being from whom all comes forth and to whom all returns again; and the man whose soul is most powerfully dominated by these thoughts is the leader from whose lips the language of public worship will most naturally flow.

The question next arising is this. Taking public worship as the act of the community, what should be its spirit? What emotion should prevail? What tone should be heard? What should be the characteristic mood? One word answers all these questions: it is, Joy. Variation from that mood must no doubt occur, subsidiary emotions must find expression, stages of humiliation, of sadness, of baffled endeavour, must be passed before the glad climax is reached; but joy must ever be the primary and typical note of public worship. If all does not end in joy, then the path has been missed. A common consciousness is by its very nature a joyous state of mind. In isolation we are depressed; apart from others we are abashed and sometimes terrified at our own weakness; but the moment we hear the language which reminds of our connection with the All of Life, and feel the vital links which make the many one, the misery of weakness takes its departure and the joys of strength rise within us like a summer morn. And I sometimes try to think what a blessed change would come over the tone of our public worship if those of us who conduct it would remember that it is no mere collection of stray individuals, but the Church Militant on whose behalf we utter prayer and praise. The Church Militant exults in the sense of a living connection with a mighty and an endless past. It glows with the expectation of victory. It glories in obedience to its Living Head. The secret of conquest over suffering and death is carried before it, as in the Ark of God; and in its heart there is the consciousness of an Eternal Right and Truth, which no sin of man can divert from its object, and no weakness deprive of its efficacy; even the faith that burned in the Hebrew prophet when he called upon the nations to "arise and shine," and in St. Paul when he bade men "rejoice always and again rejoice." The voice that utters a genuine public worship must repeat that note. It must be inspiring, confident, and exultant. Its language must always be partly clothed in song. And the hymns which it sings must not be the lonely meditations of pietism; but celebrations of the impersonal joys, struggles, and victories of the marching hosts of God, lifting the soul beyond itself, and quickening the pulse of the universal heart. As a type of a perfect hymn I would mention Milton's "The Lord will come and not be slow," or "Creator Spirit, by whose light." Nearly perfect is that hymn, by which the life of an obscure Liverpool missionary has been made a blessing to the whole Church, "Come, kingdom of our God." Alas! there are but few of such in our hymn-books. But there are hundreds which illustrate all that which I contend public worship ought not to be.

I will not be guilty of the impertinence of criticising in detail the manner in which public worship is conducted in our churches. But perhaps I may, without offence, record a few general impressions. In many cases I believe the whole matter has been treated with amazing neglect, until the service has become a mere relic of what worship once was, and a mere travesty of what it ought to be. In other cases, of which this cannot be said, one has sometimes noticed a singular phenomenon. There comes into our midst a man of deep religious earnestness, with whom, however, others can find no common ground of religious aspiration. Inquiring into the history of the facts you find that the deep religiousness of this man has always been admitted. It is even rightly recognised as his chief qualification for the ministry, and the hope has been entertained, perhaps too blindly, that such a devotional nature would, of necessity, become an efficient leader of public devotion, and by the very depth of its own religious life become to others an inspiring interpreter of theirs. But what has happened? This man, who perhaps from his birth was marked out to preach the Gospel, has brought into the Church with its open door that spirit which he is wont to take into the inner chamber when the door is shut. The worship which he is publicly conducting is private worship. He is treating his congregation not as a unit animated by a common soul, not as the joint heirs of a great antiquity and the joint participators in a common hope, but as a collection of individuals who for some strange reason have come together, each to make his separate case the subject of prayer. Under these conditions there is only one way in which public worship can be conducted—namely, in silence, as the Quakers do. But here speech is used. The one standing in the pulpit essays to speak for the many gathered in the pews, and that in language which leaves them many instead of making them one. Observe the impossible conditions to which the leader of public worship here exposes himself. Earnest and courageous as his spirit may be, note how unkindly it takes to its task. It is evident that the mind is thinking the thoughts of prayer, the mouth is speaking its words, but the spirit is not praying. And the reason is that he is compelling it to face conditions under which it cannot live. Exposed to publicity it loses heart, and then dies altogether. By none of those present is the burden of the situation felt so heavily as by the minister himself. He is labouring with an impossibility. Mark how his presence, his manner, his tone become invested with a preternatural solemnity—more akin to death than life. He may speak of joyous things, but no accent of joy escapes from his lips. Among those who listen, some will turn a deaf ear, others whose ears are open will wince, but few will worship. No one is inspired; no one exults; no one rejoices in the Lord. As records of inward piety the value of such utterances may stand high: but they are not for public use. They represent the type of devotion which publicity simply kills. As prayers for the congregation they are bound to fall flat. They cease to be prayers so soon as they come out of the closed chamber in which they were born. They spring from the futile attempt to assimilate public to private worship. They may disintegrate, but they can never integrate Church life.

I venture to say that the best public extempore prayers are not the expressions of personal religious experience. They spring from an intense sympathy with life, from a profound interest in the not-self. Such prayers we have all been blessed to hear and join in, though perhaps not often. Recalling such instances it seems to me that in every case the motive has been the love of man. The language has been extremely simple. The object of prayer has been of a kind that even children could share in the desire for it. Permanent needs were suggested, the great memories of the race were recalled, the cloud of witnesses was invoked and brought near, words of elemental truth were spoken, under the influence of which one entered into a life beyond oneself. The Church Militant was made joyfully conscious of that unbroken line of communications which unites it to the past. All was veracious to the last degree; but studied veracity of religious expression was not there. The quiet confidence in God which comes to a man so naturally when he has forgotten himself, took the place of that labouring with theological conceptions which is the death of prayer. Finding a channel through the broad humanity of the speaker, that confidence seemed to infect the whole congregation. Of that overwrought solemnity, which is so far from solemn, there was not a trace; of that portentous gravity which causes depression without inspiring awe, there was not a suggestion: but instead of this, ease of manner, lightness of touch, buoyancy of spirit, naturalness of expression. It was the difference between the ponderous progress of a steam roller and the flight of a lark. Joy was there, and faith, and hope, and love, the greatest of all.

I would here guard against a misunderstanding to which I am perhaps exposed through the attempt to draw a sharp distinction between private and public prayer. Let no one suppose that I recommend the adoption of two religions, one for use in private, the other for exhibition in public. The distinction between the two types of worship is, of course, not absolute. It is a mere difference of aspects, and yet of immense practical importance as such. Public and private worship are complementary. The private act becomes feeble and meaningless when the public is neglected. The public presupposes the private. I should say that the ideal conditions for the conduct of public worship are attained when the minister strictly observing the distinction between the two acts brings to the performance of the one a spirit which has been sanctified by the exercise of the other. I will not deny that the purely personal part of religious experience may be present in public worship, granted only that it be present in reserve. In the same manner we may say that a preacher ought to have a metaphysics, but not to display it: a theology, which he makes felt rather than heard. As the manifest motive of any public prayer, as the avowed subject of any sermon, the personal side of religion is out of its proper place. It would be more impressive if it were a little further back. Not long ago a layman of great intelligence said to the minister of one of our churches, "Do you know why I never come to church? No? Well, I will tell you. It is because I cannot bear to be the spectator of your devotions, nor to let you be the spectator of mine."

Nor must it be forgotten that some of what are now the most precious utterances of impersonal religion were intensely personal in their origin. This holds true of the finest of the Psalms. The 139th Psalm was originally a private prayer of the most intimate character. But for us to-day it has become purely impersonal. The individual whose inward life is there recorded has been completely lost sight of. We remember him not, think not of him, do not even know who he was. What we do remember, and are conscious of, is that great continuity of religious experience which has found expression in those words through centuries of usage. How very differently we should be affected by the words if we could hear them without their historical character! What very different feelings they would arouse in one if spoken for the first time in public by a man whose face we saw, whose voice we heard, whose personality we knew! The state of most men's minds would be one of shrinkage rather than expansion, of recoil rather than welcome. That, I must confess, has been the effect on my own mind on hearing certain passages of Newman's Theism read in church. No doubt such words must be born somewhere. I would only contend that a church is not the proper place for them to make their first appearance in the world.

I end, as I began, by pleading for prophetic reserve as the basis of that prophetic power which leads the public worship of men. Nothing is so much spoken of as religion; nothing so little spoken of in the right way. One of the standing marvels of the world is the ability which religion shows to survive the rude oceans of speech which are ever threatening to destroy her—to spoil her sanctity, to drown her beauty, to dash her to pieces on the rocks of controversy. Religion is the victim of an unending outrage from the lips of man. I ask, is there anything else among the higher and more sacred parts of life which could bear to be talked about to that extent, and not become in the process vulgarised beyond recognition. And yet religion lives and is herself. Consider the intimate and more sacred relationships of private life. Are these matters of which every loud voice may be suffered to talk its fill? Once in a thousand years, perhaps, some Shakespeare will arise who can so frame the converse of Romeo and Juliet, that we, being perfectly confident in the fineness of the great artist's perception, can bear to hear that converse repeated on the public stage. But here is a relationship a thousand times more intimate, an innermost shrine a thousand times more hallowed—and will anyone say that this may be exposed to publicity without restraint everywhere, and always, and on any terms whatsoever? Is this the part of man's life which we can most safely make into a subject of forced speech or unnatural manners? Are these the truths that are best served by saying about them as much, rather than as little, as possible? Were religion anything but herself she would be killed every Sunday by the things which men do and say in her name. But she lives through it all, and the same smile is upon her face to-day as beamed upon the children who gathered round the feet of Christ. Let us depend upon it that one who has power to survive the rudeness of the many who serve her without restraint, has power to richly bless the few who serve her with reverence and godly fear.

In conclusion, let me gather to a head the points for which I seek the approval and sympathy of the Conference. It is of the nature of public worship to be universal, historical, and impersonal. To make it so in practice our first step would be to forsake that mode of conducting the service which leaves it a personal monologue of the minister's. The next would be to create and to give to the Church a form of words and usages which should belong to our laity as truly as the Prayer Book belongs to the laity of the Establishment, which should express their aspirations as well as the minister's, and be repeated by their lips as well as his. Such things I believe needful to all Churches, but vitally needful to ours, because having no common creeds it is only by a common worship that our spiritual unity can ever be demonstrated or expressed. And whatever forms be used, let them above all things be forms of beauty and of joy. In an age when Beauty is invading and conquering every department of life, when Beauty once suspected as a wile of Satan is now welcomed as a smile of God, let us too bring Beauty over to our side, and let us bid a last and long farewell to the ugliness which has lorded over us for so long. Hymns that are not joined in, discursive prayers that are not listened to, anthems badly sung, gloomy churches, heavy and joyless manners, O brethren, let us set our hearts to make away with this miserable and disastrous state of things. Is there nothing in which we can be persuaded to sink our personalities? Is it false to say we have common consciousness springing from unity of life in God? Is it true that this consciousness can never bear to hear itself expressed? Is it good to dream of a time when the worship of our churches, instead of representing as now every variety of life and death, shall pulse with the one life in which every free soul is brother to its fellow? The world is for ever asking us what do you believe in, what do you stand for—and we are ever trying to answer that question by sermons and pamphlets and books, and by laboured explanations of ourselves. Friends, there are only two ways in which a religion can explain itself to the world. One is by the lives of its members. That answer, I thank God, has not been altogether withheld. The other is by its worship. That waits to be given. If we cannot exhibit our religion before the world in the unity of its worship, there is nothing else by which we can prove that it is one.

The Chairman expressed his admiration of the paper, and his great regret that Dr. Brooke Herford, who was to have opened the discussion, and the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, who was also to have spoken, had been unable to remain for the meeting.

Miss Clephan, in opening the discussion, said that they would all be agreed that there was one conduct of public worship that was real and complete, equally shared by minister and congregation, devoted heart and soul, in truth, earnestness and fervour to the glory of God. Given that, it mattered little whether it expressed itself in the elaborate ritual of the cathedral, the simple prayer of the conventicle or the silent aspiration of the Friends' meeting. The outward expression was little if the inward meaning be all. That of course was a truism, but it was often as necessary to insist on the truth of a truism as of a paradox. Too often elaborate ritual forgot its first purpose, and stopped short in the glory of man, while the simple, untutored service of the chapel was so slipshod in performance that it doubly failed in testifying either to the glory of God or of man.

It would seem that the old methods of expressing themselves in public worship were no longer attaining their end. All around they heard that they were fast out-growing their simple earlier forms of worship, that their churches were emptying while others were full, and they concluded that there was something at fault in the public confession of their faith. Some blamed the choir, some the minister, or the building, or the situation, some even the faith itself. Perhaps the congregations themselves were none too ready to include in their strictures, unless it were the occupants or non-occupants of the other pews. But she wished most earnestly to state her conviction that wherever the defect might lie, it was not in the faith itself. The faith was rich and full enough to fill the soul of minister and people, of young and old. It was a glorious faith. If they were strong and true and fervent, and wise enough to show it forth in their actions and lives, the dreams of the few mystics among them might one day come true, and a universal comprehensive Church become a living reality. So few of them were ready to work from the inside. They talked of music and liturgy, and perhaps wisely enough; of a bright service, to hold their young people, and to attract others. They exaggerated the fear of losing their young people. The weakness of the congregations lay not in the absence or inertness of the young people. Given Church work to do, and they clustered round like a hive of bees, active in good works in church, school and mission. If the young people could only see that the worship was a living reality from which their parents and others drew their spiritual support and their power for good work, they in their turn would learn to look to the faith of their fathers as the source of their own strength, and would love the service in which it was expressed. They ought not to hanker after numbers, but should simply strive to make their public worship the expression of the highest aspiration, assured that "Slow are the steps of freedom,

But her feet turn never back."

The Rev. E. I. Fripp pleaded for the adoption of the English Prayer-book, modified to meet their needs, as it had been modified in earlier years, to meet the needs of the Reformers. It rested with them, as sprung from an unwilling Nonconformity, to provide for the nation a reformed Church of England worship. The Book of Common Prayer was one of the great religious classics of the world. It had grown up with the religious life of England; it was far more than a Reformation-book, but it had been made by the Reformers emphatically a people's book. Prayer-book English was among the best in the language, the strong melodious speech of Coverdale, Latimer and Ascham, the language of a time when England was remarkably English, when she had discovered her genius and was glad with a great joy; it was a speech without a parallel in their history for force, sincerity and music. And the form of the service he held to be the best, from the opening confession and assurance of forgiveness passing to the psalm of praise. Why should they turn their backs on such a book? It was their inheritance as well as that of others; they had a right to it, and a right to adapt it to their use, as the revisers of other generations had done. They had a special reason for doing so, because their theology was strange to the mass of English people. With that barrier between them they ought all the more to worship in a manner familar to the people, to make them as far as possible at home among them. Then why draw up liturgies of their own, which must be strange and unattractive to the people, without associations, poetry or imagination, and probably such as would cease to satisfy themselves in a few years? It was far better to adopt the old book, and very few alterations were needed, chiefly omissions, and those were best. Then in such a service, place could be found for the minister's prayer, for that also was needed. The liturgy needed supplementing, there must be the outpouring of the man's own heart.

The Rev. Rudolf Davis referred to the distinction Mr. Jacks had drawn between public and private worship. He was glad that towards the end of the paper the distinction was somewhat less, for it would be disastrous to the religious feeling of the services, if it were carried out to its full extent. The matter of private devotion could be treated in a manner suitable to public worship. If it were not, a large number, probably the majority of the congregation, especially among the working-classes, would have no expression of such religious life at all, for they had no private devotions. On the subject of lessons in the service he differed profoundly from Mr. Jacks. Nothing that any minister could say on the value of biblical lessons would he dissent from, but he regretted that the lessons of their services should be confined to the Bible; he would suggest that one lesson should be biblical and the other non-biblical. The foundation principle of their religion was the continued revelation of God. They looked upon the past in the light of their own religious experience. They did not get their first knowledge of God from the past, but at first hand, and he maintained that they were faithless to that first principle in confining their lessons to the Bible. He agreed with Mr. Jacks that lessons should be rich in association where possible. Association consecrated the true, but it might also blind to the untrue.

Mr. James Shone (Belfast) expressed his preference for the Ten Services, rather than a revised Prayer-book service. He could not agree to the distinction between public and private worship. The effect of such a form as had been advocated would be to leave out what was personal and most deeply touched the soul.

The Rev. E. W. Lummis also protested against the over-drawn distinction between the character of public and private worship, and the exclusion of extra-biblical lessons. The sermon he thought should be only a further part of the act of worship.

Mr. J. Cogan Conway referred to the revised Ten Services as the most valuable gift Dr. Martineau had left to them, and urged their general adoption.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond explained that the first eight of the services were Dr. Sadler's, and only the Ninth and Tenth Dr. Martineau's. Mr. Conway repeated that he referred to the revised form of the services.

The Rev. J. Ruddle did not think that Psalm 139 was the more valuable because the author was unknown. He instanced the deeper meaning felt in some of the Wesleys' hymns, because of our knowledge of the men and their trials.

Mr. W. Colfox then moved, and the Rev. R. Lyttle seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to Dr. Blake Odgers for his services as President, to which he replied that no thanks should be given, and he was grateful to have been allowed to serve the Conference during his term of office.

The closing hymn, "God of the earnest heart," having been sung, the Benediction was pronounced by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, and the Conference was at an end.

We have found it impossible to make a full list of ministers, delegates, and others present at the Conference, and can only append the following very imperfect list:—Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., president; Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, treasurer; Messrs. A. W. Worthington and C. Fenton, secretaries; Messrs. J. Cogan Conway, David Martineau, Edwin Ellis, G. H. Leigh, Edwin Clephan, H. T. Cooper, members of Committee; Professor and Mrs. Gilman, Meadville; Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Mrs. Crompton, Mrs. Odgers, Mrs. H. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"A Great Wonder."

Children, I have three things to tell you. This time I shall tell you a Wonder, next week a Secret, and then a Bit of Good News. A Great Wonder. A Grand Secret. A Bit of Good News for each of you. First of all, A Great Wonder.

One time a French bishop did his best to puzzle a French boy. The boy's name was Chateauneuf. He was smart and good, well-educated and very thoughtful. They were sitting together in a lovely garden. The bishop said: "Chateauneuf, I will give you an orange if you can tell me where God is." The boy sat silent a little to think. Then he replied: "And I will give you two, if you can tell me where He is not!" And the bishop was more puzzled than the boy, for they both knew that God is everywhere!

Did you ever hear of Mungo Park? He was a Scotch lad who, when he grew to be a man, more than a hundred years ago, became a great African explorer. Many strange things happened to him, among the savages, in the forests, on the rivers, and upon the hot sands of the African desert. One thing only I am now going to tell. Mungo Park had been taken prisoner by a savage chief who kept him in slavery for five months. Then, one night, with a horse, a little clothing, and a pocket compass, he escaped. He had 500 miles to travel before he could reach any friends. Before he had gone a hundred miles the horse died. He set out to walk over the wide desert of dull red sand. Days and nights he walked, until, his food done and no water to be found, his body shaking with weakness, his head burning with fever, he dropt, as if dead, in the desert. How long he lay like that he never knew. He found himself just lying there, too ill to rise.

All around him stretched the wide waste of deep red sand, all above him the broad bare sky, and he dying there, without help, alone! So it seemed. But, just as he turned over on his side, he saw, peeping out of the sand, a tiny piece of green moss. Mungo Park was fond of flowers and he cried: "O the dear wee bit of moss;—why, God is here after all!"

Then he prayed and took heart again. He rose, he crawled and staggered on a little further. A negro woman with her daughter found him. They took him to her hut, laid him on soft skins, gave him goat's milk, and sung him to sleep with a song which they must have made, for he understood the chorus to mean:

"Pity the poor white man
No mother has he."

And so, by the mysterious life of that little green moss, and by the motherly love of that dark negro woman, Mungo Park found, even in the desert, that God was there!

When I was a boy I read something which I may never forget. It thrilled me and filled me with such wonderful thoughts. I have read many wise and beautiful things from the same great genius since, Jean Paul Richter. But this was about a man being called from his dreams, and taken, by a mighty Angel, up through the heaven of heavens, to see the largeness of God's Universe. Millions of miles upward they swiftly sped; myriads of starry worlds they saw and left behind them; until the man cried: "Is there no end?" And still his Angel-guide took him on and on, sometimes over long spaces of deepest darkness, then between blazing worlds that rushed in silence round. Yet, as the two moved onward, it was only to meet stars more and more, while on all sides in the far distances could be seen worlds on worlds without number. "Is there no end?" cried the man again. "For, Angel, I can go no further!" And the mighty Angel threw up his glorious hands and said: "Is there no end? No! The immeasurable universe of God is without end and without beginning!"

Now think! Your mind can move and fill your whole body. A man's mind can do more. Dr. Martineau's mind, Dr. Channing's mind could fill—what? Who can tell? Have not men's minds filled the world with thoughts and things? But see! see! God's mind fills and moves the whole Universe,—the Earth, the Heavens, and you and me! That is the Great Wonder. God is everywhere—God is here.

Let us now learn, and then silently think about these words of Jesus:—

"God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in Spirit and in truth."

J. J. Wright.

ESSEX HALL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

In connection with the meetings of the National Conference at Leicester, a meeting was held at the Temperance Hall, on Thursday evening, April 5, under the auspices of the Essex Hall Temperance Association, to consider Lord Peel's Minority Report of the Royal Commission on Licensing. The Mayor of Leicester presided, and was supported on the platform by the Revs. Dr. Drummond, S. A. Steinthal, J. T. Sunderland, and others. There was a good attendance, which nearly filled the lecture hall.

After a short address by the Mayor, in which he expressed the fullest sympathy with the object of the meeting,

Dr. Drummond moved:—

That this meeting, while maintaining the principle of popular control over the drink traffic, approves generally of the recommendations contained in Lord Peel's report, and earnestly entreats the Government to carry these recommendations into effect by legislation.

He pointed out several excellent features in the report, such as (1) reduction of the number of licences, which would mean less temptation, less need for police supervision, and the removal of the worst class of houses; (2) the substitution of a representative licensing authority for the present irresponsible one; (3) more stringent regulations in the case of "tied houses"; (4) prohibition of the sale of drink to children under sixteen; (5) abolition of grocers' and confectioners' licenses; (6) an honest attempt at solving the vexed problem of compensation by raising a levy on the remaining licences. On this last point he thought the recommendations of the report were particularly valuable, as they removed an objection felt by many people who, while recognising that the publican had no legal claim to compensation, thought he had a moral claim; while, on the other hand, those who strenuously opposed the application of puplic money for the purpose might readily fall in with the proposal. In conclusion, he pleaded for united action, and urged that the passing of a law on the lines advocated would be no barrier to further progress, as some seemed to fear.

The Rev. C. J. Street seconded the resolution, though, as he said, an extremist on the Temperance question. This was a crisis in the history of the movement, and if the Temperance party could not unite on this platform, he knew not on what they could unite. He indicated several points of substantial agreement between the majority report and that of the minority, such as reduction in the hours of opening, the protection of children from the evil influences of the public-house, making habitual drunkenness a ground of legal separation by construing it as cruelty, extension of the bonâ-fide travellers' limit, &c. While opposed to any form of compensation out of public funds, he was prepared to accept the minority proposals, which were really commutation rather than compensation. He believed the general feeling in the U.K.A., to which he belonged, favoured this acceptance. Other important proposals in Lord Peel's report were that back-doors should be done away with, that public-houses should be closed on election days, and that registered benefit societies should not be allowed to meet in public-houses. Surely such proposals should command the support of all temperance reformers throughout the country.

The resolution was put, and declared carried unanimously.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, in rising to move the second resolution, said that if the Mayor had declared the former resolution carried nemine contradicente, he would have let it pass; but as it was, he could not help entering a mental protest, as he for one had found it impossible to vote for it. He moved:—

That in the opinion of this meeting no reform in the licensing laws will be satisfactory which does not give to the inhabitants of any district the power, by a substantial majority, to prohibit the issue or renewal of licences.

He was afraid that legislation on the lines of Lord Peel's report would make the realisation of their ideals an impossibility, at all events during the seven years covered by it. He did not believe in lowering their ideals, and was determined to stand by the old flag.

The Rev. J. T. Sunderland, while seconding the resolution, declared himself in entire sympathy with the former one, to which it was not necessarily opposed. He said the principle of local option was only an application of the universal law of life—self-preservation. The community had a right to protect itself from everything that threatened its existence and well-being; and amongst the enemies of the commonwealth there was none so dangerous as strong drink.

The Rev. J. C. Street moved, and Mr. H. G. Chancellor seconded:—

That this meeting heartily approves of the recommendation of the Royal Commission to abolish grocers' licences, and to forbid the issue of music and dancing licences to public-houses.

The Rev. F. Allen moved, and the Rev W. C. Pope seconded:—

That this meeting urges the Government to pass one of the Bills now before Parliament prohibiting the sale of drink to children under sixteen years of age; also the Bill for Sunday closing in Monmouthshire; and that the chairman be authorised to sign a petition to the House of Commons to this effect.

These resolutions were unanimously passed, as was a hearty vote of thanks to the Mayor for presiding.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Deal.—The reading circle has just completed the reading of Julius Cæsar. In the past quarter the lectures have been given by Messrs. D. Boyle and J. S. Clough; the Revs. W. E. Atack, H. Woods Perris, and T. Shakspeare (minister).

Edinburgh.—On Sunday last the Rev. R. B. Drummond gave, in St. Mark's Chapel, the last of a course of six lectures on "The Lives of Eminent Unitarians." The subjects chosen were "Servetus," "The Socini," "Joseph Priestley," "W. E. Channing," "Theodore Parker," and "James Martineau." In dealing with Dr. Martineau, Mr. Drummond said that having recently given a sketch of his life, and attempted some criticism of his philosophy, he would now speak of him exclusively as a Unitarian and his relations to Unitarianism. He then proceeded to give an interesting account of the Liverpool controversy and of Martineau's share in it, pointing out that at that time Martineau was in perfect agreement with Channing. The letters on "The Unitarian Position" and on "Church Life or Sect Life?" were next noticed, and it was shown that while claiming to belong to a wider Church than could be confined within any sectarian limit, he nevertheless remained always doctrinally a Unitarian. Long before his death he had accepted the results of the most advanced New Testament criticism. The lectures, which were largely advertised by the aid of a grant from the M'Quaker Trustees, were well attended.

Glossop.—An interesting ceremony took place at the close of the afternoon meeting of the Fitzalan-street Sunday-school on April 1. On behalf of Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, ex-president of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, the generous donor of the gift, the Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, B.A., presented to Mr. Wright Booth, of Glossop, a massive and handsome brass lamp in recognition of his long services as a Sunday-school superintendent. Mr. Booth's term of office has now reached the fortieth year, and he has gained the honourable distinction of having served in this capacity for a longer period than any other superintendent in the seventy-seven Sunday-schools connected with this Association. During the earlier part of his thirty-nine years of service Mr. Booth was superintendent of the neighbouring school at Mottram, but soon after the foundation of the Glossop Church in 1872 he relinquished that post in order to undertake a similar duty at Fitzalan-street, where he has officiated ever since, Sunday after Sunday, with untiring energy and exemplary devotion. The members of both church and school congratulate their friend and fellow-worker upon this official recognition of his labours on behalf of moral and religious education in Mottram and Glossop, and tender their warm thanks to Mr. Grundy for his kindness in sending the gift.

Guildford.—The annual Sunday-school entertainment, recently given in the Constitutional Hall, was a most gratifying success. The principal piece was the Rev. H. W. Hawkes's adaptation of Beauty and the Beast; and there were also tableaux vivants and tambourine and bar-bell drills, arranged by Miss E. F. le Duc. The audience numbered nearly three hundred.

London: Essex Church.—A special meeting of the Congregational Society, convened by the Committee, was held in the schoolroom on March 27. The Rev. Frank K. Freeston introduced for friendly conference the two proposals of a Service of Welcome, and a roll-book for signatures, which had been suggested in his annual address. The former was supported by Mrs. Charles Mitchell, who also laid stress on the advantage of preparation classes and the latter by Mr. Bryan Johnson, senior churchwarden. Interesting and earnest speeches in favour of both proposals, and enforced by personal religious experience, were then made by the following members:—Miss Violet Preston, Mrs. William Bruce, Mrs. David, Mr. Facon, Mr. Edgar Worthington, Mr. Charles Mitchell, Mr. Rupert Potter, Mr. James Beale, Lady Durning Lawrence, and Mr. Thomas Picking. The following resolution was then put to the meeting and agreed to unanimously:—"That this Conference of the Congregational Society, having considered the two proposals of (1) a Service of Dedication and Welcome for the Young, preceded by classes for religious instruction and preparation; and (2) a roll-book for the voluntary signatures of sympathisers, or future members of the church, is of opinion that both proposals, if put into operation, would tend to the religious welfare of the congregation; and that the senior churchwarden be requested to present to the Church Committee at their next meeting the terms of this resolution."

Maidstone (Appointment).—The Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., who has been in charge of the congregation at Maidstone since the commencement of the year, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become their minister.

CHURCH BUILDING SCHEME.

The Congregation and Committee beg to acknowledge the following additional donations, with thanks. The new schoolroom has now been in use since January, and there are already signs of increased success in our work amidst this rapidly growing neighbourhood. The building of the Church will be proceeded with at once, so that all our agencies may have free scope. Fully £1,000 is needed for the completion of the scheme.

It is highly desirable that this sum should be raised without resorting to a Bazaar, and the building opened free of debt.

Donations will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the following members of the Finance Committee:—

Rev. H. Gow, B.A., St. James'-road.
Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., 171, Hinckley-road.
Mr. E. F. Cooper, Lloyds' Bank, High-street (Treasurer).

London Permanent Chapel Building Fund

An Appeal to Unitarians to assist in raising at least £12,000 for the support and spread of Liberal Christianity in the Metropolitan Area.

Treasurers—FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD, Esq., and FRANK PRESTON, Esq.

(1.) A portion of the Fund, not exceeding one-third of the net amount raised, shall be devoted to paying off debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of, some of our chapels and halls in or near London. The particular congregations to receive this assistance, and the amount of the assistance to be given to each such congregation, shall be settled by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, regard being had to the efforts made by each congregation to help itself.

(2.) The remainder of the Fund, not less than two-thirds of the whole, will be formed into a Permanent Chapel Building Fund for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with Open Trusts. This Fund shall be vested in a body of twelve Trustees, who shall be nominated in the first instance by the Council of Ministers and Delegates and the Subscribers to the Special Fund. The Trustees shall have a voice in the selection of the site, and shall themselves decide what amount they will advance towards the cost of its purchase and of the erection of the building.

(3.) The sum so advanced shall be a charge on the land and building, and shall be repaid in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Trustees shall in each case deem proper. The Trustees in their discretion may remit payment of interest. The income of such portion of the Fund as is not out on loan, and the interest on any loans, shall either be paid to the Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, or added to the capital of the Fund, as the Trustees may in each case determine.

WEDNESDAY next, April 25, is the centenary of the death of William Cowper—of his release from the living death into which he had sunk. Cowper holds a place, not in the first rank of poets, but a place assured in the affections of his people, and there are hymns of his which belong to the Church Universal. It was one of the most pathetic touches in his pathetic life, that when he could no longer write hymns himself, because of the darkness of despair that was in his heart, he set himself to translate the hymns of Mme. Guyon. Speaking of the intervals between Cowper's seasons of madness and his times of worst depression, Mr. Stopford Brooke says, in his "Theology in the English Poets" :—

Till the last three years, his life had many intervals of happiness. Many lovely landscapes lay between these three valleys of the Shadow of Death, where he rested and was at peace; sweet idleness and fruitful contemplation—tender friendships and simple pleasures—hours where charming humour and simple pathos ran through one another, and interchanged their essence like the colours on a sunset sea—days of sweet fidelity to Nature in her quietest and most restoring moods—times when the peace that passeth all understanding made him as a child with God; but in the end the darkness settled down, deep and impenetrable; and the Poet, who of all English Artists, has written, to my mind, the noblest hymns for depth of religious feeling and for loveliness of quiet style, and whose life was blameless as the water lilies which he loved, and the way of life of which on silent streams he made his own; whose heart breathed the sweetest air of natural piety, and yet could sympathise with the supersensuous world in which Guyon lived—died in ghastly hopelessness, refusing comfort to the last.

OF the tragic close of Cowper's life we may repeat what was written in these columns some time ago in a series of articles on "Our Hymnody" :—

When at last he was dying he said, in answer to a question, 'I feel unutterable despair.' But afterwards it is recorded that the expression into which his countenance had settled was that of calmness and composure, mingled, as it were, with holy surprise. He had sung :—

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform,
He plants his footsteps in the sea
And rides upon the storm.

Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never-failing skill
He treasures up his bright designs
And works his sovereign will.

May we not take that happier look upon his face after the long struggle was over as an earthly symbol of what had come to him, freed from the morbid shadows of his poor diseased brain, freed also from the bondage of the detestable creed that had enthralled him—for the pure and tender spirit, 'a season of clear shining, to cheer it after rain?'

We are thankful for those hymns of Cowper's, which belong to the common heritage of all trustful worshippers of the Father in heaven. His is one of the sweetest voices that in modern times has swelled the great chorus of praise. But we are yet more thankful to believe that the sorrows of his gentle spirit are long since forgotten, that his song of praise is now far richer and more full of joy, and the cloud that settled on his heart is dissipated in the glorious light of the eternal love of God.

THE Rev. Clay McCauley, who for the last ten years has been resident at Tokyo, as representative of the American Unitarian Association in Japan, is expected to be in London next week, on his way home, where he is to take part in the International Council of Unitarians at Boston. Mr. McCauley is expected in Paris, and an invitation has been sent to him to be present at the Council Meeting of the B. and F.U.A. on Tuesday next, which it is hoped he may be able to accept. The Japan Daily Mail of March 3 contains a full report of a very cordial farewell dinner given to Mr. McCauley by the members of the Tokyo Club on the eve of his departure. His Excellency the United States Minister presided, and much regret was expressed that Mr. McCauley was relinquishing his work and leaving Japan. Mr. Fukai, a Japanese gentleman, in particular, made a very interesting speech, in which he pointed out how the Japanese had adopted Western civilisation on its material side, and that as at the same time the old foundations of their life had slipped away, they now felt that they must assimilate their intellectual and spiritual life also to that of the Western world. In that direction Mr. McCauley's long stay in the country had had a remarkable influence. There had been Christian missionaries who had done good work, but the faith offered by the majority of the missionaries had been unacceptable to the people of Japan. And he added :—

The intellectual class of our people has not been very profoundly affected by the preaching of the ordinary missionary. But Mr. McCauley's work has had, I think, a very remarkable influence on the current of thought among the higher classes of Japanese, and I think it is beyond question and admitted on every side that he has done a great deal to introduce into this country the intellectual and spiritual side of Western civilisation.

In responding, in a second speech to this spontaneous tribute Mr. McCauley said :—

My purpose in coming to Japan was not to impose upon the Japanese any faith of Western countries, but to welcome any yearnings the Japanese themselves might have toward a spiritual faith. And so my life has been one of attendance and waiting, ministry and co-operation: I have never taken the initiative. I am anxious as a friend of Japan that she shall be saved from spiritual and moral wreck. I have tried in the way of sympathy and encouragement to welcome and develope the spiritual aspirations of the Japanese themselves. We are the first to leave the country on account of action taken by the Japanese. They have entered upon an autonomous, commercial, and practical life, and we have urged them also to another life also autonomous—an autonomous religious life. And I think such a life growing out of the people themselves will be permanent, because it is of the people and not from without, and that it will grow and prosper.

LONDON UNITARIAN BAZAAR.

Miss Minna Tayler, Hon. Sec. of the Art Section writes:—"Will you allow me to make known to possible purchasers that some very valuable pictures have been received for the Art Gallery. Among the oil paintings is a 'Cecil Lawson,' worth between £70 and £80; there are also a large number of proof engravings, given by some of the best art publishers through the interest of our chairman, Mr. Gooden." Intending contributors are requested to send to Miss Tayler all particulars for catalogue not later than the 23rd inst.

Mrs. Percy Preston, 25, Mount-park-crescent, Ealing, W., will be glad if the friends who are sending contributions of flowers and fruit to the Flower Stall will ensure an early delivery on Tuesday morning, May 1, by transmitting them either by post or rail in good time on Monday, April 30, and addressed to her (marked perishable), Flower Stall, London Unitarian Bazaar, King's Hall Room, Newton-street, Holborn, W.C.

The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards (Secretary) writes:—"Several ladies are coming up from the provinces to assist at the Bazaar, for whom we are anxious to provide hospitality. Will friends in London who can render help in giving them entertainment during their visit kindly communicate with me as early as possible at Essex Hall?"

At the end of his speech on Mr. Jacks' paper at Leicester, Mr. Fripp caused much amusement by reciting the following "Hints to Worshippers," which he had drawn up for the use of the young people at All Souls' Church, Belfast:—

(1) Be in time.
(2) If late, don't enter during reading or prayer.
(3) Join in the singing, including the responses and the Amens; and if you are modest enough to say that God has not given you the power of song, then try to make a joyful noise.
(4) Kneel at prayer. Do not merely sit, and don't lounge.
(5) Try to keep your thoughts fixed on the service.
(6) Don't look round when the door opens, to see who is coming in.
(7) Do not talk nor whisper to your neighbour, especially at the opening of service.
(8) If the sermon is dull and you cannot attend, sit quietly and think of your faults, and preach yourself a sermon.

The reading of these hints on that occasion could not but cause merriment, which by no means meant that they did not contain much very excellent advice for old as well as young, and advice which in many quarters greatly needs to be taken to heart.

THE FAMINE IN INDIA.

A famine unprecedented in magnitude in the history of famines even in India in this century takes the heart out of one for writing about anything else. It is impossible for those at home to realise the full extent or the depth of the suffering to which the people here are subject. Sir Arthur Havelock, the Governor of Madras, with that touch of genuine sympathy with the sufferings of the subject population entrusted to his care, which has always characterised his Excellency's public utterances, recently and truly remarked that the unprecedented severity of the present famine "is enough to strain to breaking point the patient heart of this much enduring people." That this is no mere figure of speech will be obvious when we recall to memory the figures relating to the famine given the other day by the Hon. Mr. Ibbetson in the Viceroy's Council—namely, that the total area affected by the present famine throughout the country, including the Native States, is no less than 450,000 square miles, with a population of sixty-one millions! It seems incredible that the grim spectre of famine is at this moment threatening such a vast extent of Indian territory as would equal nearly four times the area of Great Britain, or a little more than the whole of France and Germany put together. But, none the less, such is the stern fact.

At the time of writing, the total number of persons under State relief on account of the famine is 4,374,647, or about one-fiftieth of the whole population of India. Private benevolence has come forward to supplement State aid. Maharajahs, Rajahs, and other wealthy men, with numbers of European firms and native merchants have given liberal, and in some instances, munificent subscriptions. Even more than this, it has been proved again that difficulties, trouble and sufferings have created a bond of union between classes and communities, no less than between individuals, in a way that prosperity never does. Common calamities and misfortunes are best calculated to create common fellowship and mutual sympathy between man and man; and the war in South Africa, no less than the famine in India, has tended to strengthen in the minds of all Her Majesty's subjects feelings of mutual attachment, of loyalty, and of devotion to the Empire. If the sympathy of India with England in her present troubles has been appreciated by the English people, the generous response made by England to the Lord Mayor's call for the relief of the famine-stricken in this land has evoked feelings of gratitude and attachment among the people towards the inhabitants of the ruling country.

But mutual sympathy and liberality leave the root of the distress untouched. It is doubtless satisfactory to see this silver lining in the cloud—to see the spirit of self-sacrifice awakened in every land over which floats the British flag. But a no less important result that we may expect from the present famine, coming so closely upon that of three years ago, is that the rulers of India will look more carefully into the economic condition of the country, and more especially of the condition of the agricultural classes. At present the Indian Government seems oblivious of the great need for improving the condition of the ryots. If the present famine teaches the rulers that the condition of the masses cannot be improved without effecting a radical change in the present land revenue policy of the Government, that will be the greatest good that it will have done. Unless that is done, the same calamity must continue to occur as long as the people are left without any sustaining power in times of scarcity and distress. Sir Henry Havelock has said, with pardonable pride, that "the perfection which has been attained in the Government organisation for the relief of sufferers from famine is one of the greatest triumphs of British rule in India." Precisely so, and as Mr. R. C. Dutt said the other day, it is the famine policy of the Government which has endeared the rulers to the mass of the people to a very large extent.

But surely the perfection to which Sir Henry Havelock referred cannot be the consummation for which the Government is working. Why are these famines becoming so much more and more frequent? And why are people so hopelessly prostrated by the visitation of each succeeding famine? That is the question of questions which has to be investigated in all seriousness, but which our statesmen are afraid of tackling. It is perfectly true that the evil of famine does the people of India the lasting benefit of teaching them the love of humanity. But it is not alone the people who have to learn their lesson from the oft-recurring famine. The Government have their lesson to learn too, though they have been fighting shy of it. It is time, however, that the rulers summoned up courage to look the problem fully in the face. If India is to have a famine once in every three years, just in time to prostrate the mass of the population the moment they gain the necessary physical stamina to stand on their feet, perhaps what of philanthropy there is in our wealthy men may be crushed out of them within a few years. But why are the Government unwilling to hold the investigation which is being pressed for from various quarters?

IMPRESSIONS OF THE CONFERENCE.

I.

We are back to our own centres of life and work, and are already looking upon the Conference as a memory, and an inspiration.

What a great success it was as to numbers, enthusiasm, and earnestness! The management by the Committee, the graceful and abundant hospitality of Leicester, the spirit and tone of the meetings were beyond praise.

The features of the gatherings that most impressed me were as follows:—

1. The wisdom shown in the choice of capable and devout young ministers to lead our devotions on each day of the Conference. There was in each of these services a deep devotion, an elevation of thought, and a sweetness of spirit that dwelt with us through all the subsequent proceedings of each day.

2. While there were many good papers, and some good speeches, these culminated in the delicate and spiritual appreciation and criticism of James Martineau by Stopford Brooke, the profound and thoughtful essay of Philip Wicksteed, and the kindling and inspiring speech of Joseph Wood. It was a pity Mr. Wood was crushed into a corner, but during his ten minutes of utterance he lifted the meeting into the culminating enthusiasm of the Conference.

3. The contributions to the deliberations of the Conference by Mrs. Humphry Ward and Miss Clephan revealed the greatness of the work which women can do in the gathering of those who are seeking light and guidance in divine things.

4. The practical business of the Conference was small. It was condensed into a couple of hours instead of being an enriching influence of each day. It never came before the crowded meetings, but was brought before a small audience when people were tired, and when most of our laity were away. There was little of the statesmanship which is needful if we are to be a vigorous and growing branch of the Church of God.

The above constitute what appeared to me to be the features of the Conference, though I am not forgetful of the great services of the President and the preacher, the tender tones of Charles C. Coe in his old pulpit at the Communion service, the generosity and helpfulness of our Leicester friends, and the spirit of brotherhood which characterised all the meetings. These and other good things made the Leicester Conference one of the notable milestones on our pilgrimage towards the Kingdom of God. James C. Street.

Shrewsbury.

II.

My impression of the Leicester Conference is a bright and hopeful one. As circumstances prevented me from attending the gatherings at Sheffield and Manchester, I cannot compare it with them. If a comparison were required, I must place it beside the earlier conferences at London, Leeds, and Birmingham, which are already surrounded by the tender halo of the past. In the numbers attending, and in the arrangements made for them, it would certainly bear comparison with any of these, though I am inclined to think it was less of a conference in a strict sense of the term, and more of a demonstration. There was not much conferring at the Conference. The conferring did not begin till Wednesday afternoon, and then it was strictly limited. One reason for this was the excellence and abundance of intellectual fare provided. A series of five or six courses in quick succession does not afford much time for a discussion of the viands provided; perhaps hardly the opportunity for an adequate appreciation of them.

To complain of abundance seems ungracious, but the intellectual like the physical palate has limits to its endurance. On the first full day of the Conference we had a beautiful service, and a pathetic address. Then that piece of exquisite criticism, that fine appreciation which many of us had been looking forward to for so long, and then a quiet time to think it over? Not a bit of it. No, then there was a very able historical disquisition, which I gather from your report of it would have taxed, while it rewarded, the keenest attention.

This high combination of quality and quantity was fully maintained on the following day. Owing to the necessity of returning on Friday morning I missed the papers and discussion on that most important subject, "The Conduct of Public Worship." All will agree that important as forms of worship are, the chief thing of all, without which there can be no worship, is the devotional spirit, and I have never known a Conference which seemed to be more permeated with this spirit than the Conference at Leicester. It was apparent not only at the service of Holy Communion in the Old Chapel, but at all the services. There was none of that slovenly carelessness that so often mars the devotion of both large and small gatherings. The presumptuous extempore utterance that boasts its spontaneity was not to be heard. The large audience was led, not dominated, by a good choir, in singing which was really hearty and congregational, and how beautiful and appropriate was the chanting of that great symbol of Christian Union, the Lord's Prayer! Clement E. Pike.

Newport, I.W.

III.

It is not difficult to state one's "impressions" of the National Conference; but it is not easy to allot one set of impressions precedence in expression over the others.

1. The Leicester friends scored a huge success; and the accumulated experience of Conference secretaries gives admirable fruit.

2. The Conference itself went with a swing; the meetings were better attended, and were heartier than at Sheffield. The spirit that sent more to the devotional services is plainly also a good working spirit. It seems to be natura naturans.

3. Delegates came with the idea of the Conference as "a going concern," which spelled business; and thus everything was treated as having actual bearing on the common life and interest. Laggards had not to be whipped up by energetic secretaries.

4. The only hitches in the proceedings arose from disregard of the time-limit. Well-disciplined individuals cannot enjoy even good things, which by taking to themselves 50 per cent. extra, thereby squeeze out 50 per cent. of the possibly equally good things to follow.

5. In the light of the capital five minutes' speeches after Friday morning's paper, it might possibly be well to allow in future more time for discussion. This comment is made in no spirit of criticism, for the read papers were excellent, but as a suggestion to reduce the number of papers, if to shorten them would diminish their force or quality.

6. Personally, my hopes were set on the Business Meeting; feeling that this was a critical time in the history of our band of Free Churches. For the seventh Conference not eloquence but action was needed. We were fortunate in a chairman who had an evident fondness for the proposed new rules; and it was clear he had presided over a committee which had not only felt its responsibility, but was possessed of a perspicuity equal to its hearty goodwill.

The delegates showed themselves of equally stern stuff, and the hardy "Triennials" had short shrift. It was no doubt a voluntary devolution of function to retain "The Essex Hall Year Book" as the witness to "ministers not in charge of congregations." There is no real reason why the Secretary of the Conference should find it more difficult to get their names than the names of working ministers of congregations. But the increasing importance of the National Conference will soon adjust subsidiary matters, and relieve the minds of such as look on the British and Foreign as something approaching "the accursed thing."

My impression is that the Conference acknowledged the good work of the British and Foreign, and desired to waste no precious time in formally cutting the painter.

Moreover, the delegates meant business, and were under a deep sense of gratitude to their Committee.

I am glad to have the opportunity of expressing my sincerest appreciation of their work, which will stamp them as the Red Letter Committee in Conference history.

At last we see our way towards a real union of churches, and witness is borne by the work handed over to the New Committee: (1) The Board to assist in providing for the future ministry; (2) the raising of money for the Superannuation Fund; (3) the Martineau Memorial, with suggested reference to Willaston School.

It would be only right and proper that all churches on the roll should make collections for the National Conference instead of the British and Foreign which then would be wholly individual. The congregation (was it?) that collected 10s. will hold an honourable position in future lists. Now that the National Conference is a thing "in being" it appeals to each and all. H. D. Roberts.

Chester.

IV.

It is no easy task to perform the editor's bidding and condense into half a column one's impressions of those glorious four days at Leicester. There is a temptation to overburden these lines with a long string of superlative adjectives, and I feel the lack of a due perspective which can only come with time and after a quiet perusal of several of the papers and addresses. But certain impressions there are which it will take a great deal to efface from memory. The first is that the days were indeed full days. With half a hundred old friends to see and chat with over old times, with important messages for half-a-dozen persons whom you invariably "just missed," and with meetings almost every hour, Conference Week, which for me began and ended with a ten hours' railway ride, was no playtime. Looking back on it all, one feels now that it was decidedly refreshing and recreative, but it was almost impossible to obey the injunction of an elder brother to "Do the meeting that lies nearest thee."

To one who for upwards of seven years has occupied one of the outposts of the faith in this northern kingdom, where men and women are by nature excessively reserved (if not modest), the predominant feature of the Conference was the remarkably warm-hearted reception of us by all sections of the Leicester community. The fact, alluded to by one of the speakers, of the existence of a "corporate roll of hosts," comprising Church people, Baptists, Congregationalists, Unitarians, and I know not how many others, all willing and even eager to provide hospitality for the delegates to any Conference, no matter what the denomination, is surely nothing less than a most significant sign of the times and a splendid example, worthy of emulation by every other town in Great Britain. This was the amazing thing, that people of all denominations should sink intellectual differences and hold out to us the right hand of fellowship. Who can tell what beneficial effects upon all of us may not come from this intercourse and fraternisation? May this spirit of genial fellowship grow from more to more! Not unworthy of mention in this connection were the friendly leaderettes in the Leicester Post day by day. But the essence of what I must call the Leicester spirit of good-fellowship seemed to be incarnate in the person of the Mayor, who was the embodiment of everything a host ought to be.

There was one moment in the first day's proceedings when, I fancy, most of us were constrained to hold our breath. It was in the course of Professor Gillman's speech, when he proposed to quote Kipling in reference to Dr. Martineau. The juxtaposition of these two names was startling, but needless to say the quotation was peculiarly apposite and a very happy thought:

And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame,
But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star, Shall draw the Thing as he sees It for the God of Things as They Are!

Mr. Stopford Brooke's eloquent tribute to Dr. Martineau, Mr. Wicksteed's paper on "The Fear of God and the Sense of Sin," and the fine speeches at the great Public Meeting on the Thursday, these will remain as a lasting inspiration. The absence of Mr. Maddison was regrettable, but the time at the Public Meeting went quickly, as it always does. At what hour it would have concluded had the fourth speaker been present, is matter for conjecture. Would it not be wise to start this, the most important meeting, a little earlier, so that the speakers may not be hurried?

I return to the labour in this little corner of the vineyard with fresh courage and renewed vigour, proud of my heritage as a Unitarian, and, spite of all Mr. Fripp may say, proud of the name, which seems to me the grandest, most comprehensive name by which any religious body could be denominated. My impressions of the Conference could be summed up in one word—good, unhesitatingly good in every way. From the opening meeting to the close the interest never flagged, and apart from the flow of speech on the platform, what cheer and courage came from the warm hand clasp of old friends and companions—what excellent arrangements for the comfort and convenience of every one, and all without a single hitch. How kindly, too, did our hosts and hostesses of almost every communion receive us—Churchmen and Dissenters alike vying with each other in their desire to make the heretic happy and glad—nay, no longer the heretic, but a common Christian worker. No one whose happy privilege it was to be at the Leicester Conference will ever forget it—how bright was that first gathering in the large room of the Great Meeting School—did anyone ever see such a cordial Unitarian assembly, and followed by that beautiful and tender Communion Service. The reading of the Scripture by Professor Carpenter in that sacred hour took us back to the voice and figure of him who first spoke those words: "Do this in remembrance of me." And what a crowd greeted us an hour later in the large room of the Temperance Hall to listen to that excellent sermon—with one failing only—the fault, indeed, that ran through all the prepared speeches—just a little too long, a fault which was exhibited so sadly at the Public Meeting on the Thursday night in the same place.

We wended our way to the meeting on the Tuesday night in somewhat of a downpour, the only really disagreeable weather of all the time; but how brightly gleamed the sun on Wednesday morning as we all came together, most of us in time too, to hear one of our young ministers speak to us of "Our Aim and Our Hope," and to tell us "that the war was not over"—a good keynote, although, alas, the note was a little too long drawn out—and who will ever forget that next hour when the sun shone in the outer life, aad helped to light up the inner sunshine upon the radiant face of Stopford Brooke. Did anyone ever so truly realise and manifest the enjoyment which the speaker had in paying his tribute to the great master—laying a love wreath, and so glad to do it—the very organ blower drawn out of his shelter by the manifest interest of the audience, and the melody of that voice. Mr. Odgers' paper will already have been read, and probably re-read as it needs and deserves. It is not, therefore, needful that I should speak of it. One of the happiest signs of the Conference probably was the intense interest shown in Mr. Ellis's admirable paper, and the undoubted echo won in all hearts by the words of Mr. Byles. It was not possible for me to stay to hear Mr. A. H. Worthington's paper on "The Future Supply of our Ministers," but I think that paper may be aptly described by one who has since read it as probably "the best of the whole" of the papers presented for discussion. Thursday morning brought with it the brief and impressive address by Mr. Weatherall, rich and ripe with the spirit of the holy life, all the better, too, because it did not err on the side of being too long—preparing so fitly for those addresses by Mr. Wicksteed and Mrs. Humphry Ward, which one was thankful were not to be spoiled by any after discussion, but to be enjoyed then and there, and to be thought of and remembered in those hours when "alone, with the Alone."

It was fortunate that the business part of the Conference should have been presided over by the one man amongst us who could so happily and genially, and yet so firmly and masterfully keep the somewhat unruly in order, the only disappointment being that the discussion on Mr. Cogan Conway's paper had to take place when so many were somewhat tired and weary—not too tired, however, to turn up again at the great meeting in the evening when—and one must say it—a great opportunity was missed, Mr. Wood very wittily and wisely refusing to make his speech at twenty minutes to ten.

Friday morning saw many of the friends already gone, and others on the wing, but Mr. Jacks' admirable paper drew together a good audience and it was pleasant to see and hear the general agreement therewith, and to listen to the cheerful and hopeful words of Miss Clephan.

On Saturday morning most of us were to be found at the various railway stations ready for our journey home, all the stronger for the social fellowship, the inspirations of the preacher and prophet and the calls to the higher life made not in speech alone but in hymn that swelled so joyously, and the words of the Master sung so reverently by the great multitude. The Triennial Conference takes place just at the proper time, after the more or less prolonged winter's meetings.

If these great gatherings occurred more frequently, possibly some of the zest would be wanting; yet I am persuaded that our congregations would be immensely helped by a more liberal supply of such good things as were provided for us last week.

To go to our Conferences and Whitsuntide Meetings ought to be regarded as a privilege to strive for, and I think those of our friends who were unavoidably kept away from Leicester missed a great treat, which, in a measure, they will recover by reading the reports of the proceedings.

But they will miss the good spirit that prevailed, and was quite infectious.

Then, too, they will only hear of, they will not feel, the unbounded hospitality of the kind friends who took care of us during our sojourn in the clean, healthful town of Leicester.

I wish there was to be another Triennial Conference next week.

VII.

My impressions are of the most pleasant character; it was a time of refreshing, and no doubt its good influence will be felt for a long time to come.

The address of the President (Dr. Blake Odgers) and his conduct of the business were all that could be desired; the short but hearty speech of Mr. Clephan welcoming the Conference to Leicester, together with the tea which followed, made the visitors feel thoroughly at home. The Communion Service was most deeply impressive, the beautiful address of Mr. Coe, and the appropriate words of Mr. Carpenter, must have touched for good a tender place in all hearts. This service, following immediately on the hearty reception, gave the right tone to the Conference, sending it on its way with joy and strength.

To those who are accustomed to worship in small assemblies, the service in the Temperance Hall must have been exceptionally inspiring in every way. Mr. Hargrove's sermon was able and telling, but it struck me that he might have emphasised at least a second point in our common belief. However, Mr. Hargrove has more experience than I, and probably did the right thing.

In the Rev. Stopford Brooke's address on "James Martineau," we have the gem of the Conference. It would be hard to conceive a more faithful and just estimate of the great thinker, and one more eloquently and beautifully set forth than that which Mr. Brooke put before his audience. There is one point in which his audience did not agree with him, and that is when he set out by saying in effect that he was not the proper person to deal rightly with so important a theme, and Mr. Brooke must have been convinced before he finished that he, on that point, was in a minority of one. No more fitting choice could have been made, and where could one be found who could have painted the lights and shades of Martineau's life, its strength, and its limitation so truly and beautifully as it was done by Mr. Brooke! It takes a great man to do full justice to a great man, and to set out clearly the place such occupied in the economy of God. The picture was perfect, and to my mind would not have been improved had the painter possessed more knowledge, of a kind, of the subject.

Then the paper by Mr. Odgers on "The Historical Development of our Faith and Freedom" was able and instructive, and the discussion which followed interesting. But one of the functions that will not soon be forgotten was the conversazione, and the genial, hearty, and manly speech by the Mayor, than which none could have been better. And then one could not fail to be impressed, not only with the abounding hospitality of the Leicester people of all denominations, but with the broad and liberal spirit that evidently pervades the community, and obviously no better representation of this could have been found than his Worship, the Mayor of Leicester. Such conditions as prevail in and around Leicester must be most favourable to the growth of all that is best and noblest in our common Christianity. J. A. Kelly.

Through American Eyes.

The first impression that I received, and one that remained to the end, was of the striking similarity, in the main, between the Conference at Leicester and the National Conferences which I have been accustomed to attend in America. Of course there were certain differences. But these had to do mainly with methods —the way of doing things—and had little relation to more important matters. From the opening reception in the Great Meeting schoolroom, where the two most conspicuous faces that looked down on us from the walls were those of Martineau, the Englishman, and Emerson, the American, to the closing hymn of the Conference, written by the American, Samuel Johnson, but sung with as much fervour as if it had been written by the English Bowring or Gaskell or Stopford Brooke, everything said and done declared that English and American Unitarianism, in their aim, their spirit, and their central thought, are not simply closely related, they are absolutely one.

In nearly every respect the Conference seemed to me excellent. I was impressed with the thoughtful care which the Leicester people had taken to provide for every want of their guests. On its social side the Conference seemed to me a decided success. The teas, the luncheons, and the conversazione afforded the delegates and visitors ample opportunities for social intercourse. The conversazione is a Conference feature which the American Unitarians may well adopt from their English brethren. The President's opening address was admirable. The Communion on the first evening, and the devotional meetings with which each day began, were uplifting. I doubt if on the platform of any religious body in the world can be heard abler or nobler papers than three or four that were read at Leicester.

Two or three things I missed at Leicester. There was no Women's Meeting—something which we always have at our National Conferences in America. The women of the American Unitarian Churches are organised into a National Women's Alliance, which has a local branch in nearly every church. The object of the Alliance is missionary. Without detracting from any activity which men and women naturally carry on together, it brings a distinct new and valuable agency to the practical and missionary side of denominational work. At the National Conference an afternoon is set apart for the meeting of the National Women's Alliance, and it is one of the best features of the Conference.

Another thing that I missed was a meeting of the young people. The National Young People's Religious Union in America draws many young people to the National Conference, and the meeting of the Union that is held there is felt to be one of the most important gatherings of the week. If the paper read by Mr. Ellis at Leicester produces the result which is hoped for, we may expect that the future Conferences in England will have the advantage of a larger attendance of young people, and of a distinct Young People's Meeting.

I could not but regret that so important a practical matter as Temperance was crowded into a corner at Leicester. Shall we not become wiser than that, if we are really in earnest to combat evil and to build up the Kingdom of Heaven in this world?

I hoped that the Conference would pass a resolution with regard to the terrible Indian famine. It seemed to me a pity not to give expression to the sympathy which surely was in all our hearts, for the millions of our brothers in India who are starving, coupling the same with some word of earnest appeal in their behalf.

I confess, too, that I hoped the Conference would see its way to some clear unmistakable utterance in favour of Peace, and in deprecation of the terrible war spirit which is so sadly prevalent, and which so little is being done to counteract. Even if no united action was possible regarding the present national complications, could not, at least, a calm firm resolution have been adopted in favour of the principles of the Hague Conference? I cannot but think that such an utterance from us would have been a moral tonic of value to the country.

The Conference seemed to me stronger on its thought side than on its practical side. Indeed, I was impressed with what seemed almost a studied avoidance of any subject having a sociological (not to say a political or national) bearing. Perhaps this was intended. Perhaps it was wise. But I was hardly prepared for it.

What I missed most in the Conference was the missionary note, the spirit of hope and courage, the clear and resolute look outward, but especially forward. Perhaps I expected more at Leicester because of the fact that we are so near the beginning of a new century.

I had looked forward to the meeting with the expectation of hearing a clear and strong call for an advance, all along the line; for an entrance upon the new century with fresh zeal, with enlarged plans for missionary and church activity, and with a deepened sense of our splendid responsibilities. Some of our sister denominations are awake—gloriously awake—and bending all their energies to the task of raising great "Funds" with which to mark the new century's opening. I do not see why we should be less awake, less forward-looking, less aggressive, less alive to the greatness of our mission. I wish the Conference could have been a little less concerned about the past and more about the future; a little less absorbed in itself and more intent on doing something for the world. I wish its utterances and its plannings might have been marked by a more distinct and courageous missionary spirit. I should have been glad if, with one clear illuminating paper on what the century just closing has done for liberal religion in England, we might have had another paper of prophetic insight and power on what the century, so soon to be born, ought to do, and will do if we and our children are faithful to our great trust.

As it was, the Conference was interesting, helpful, strong. Its influence must be excellent upon all our churches. It must strengthen our cause in many ways. I count it a great privilege to have been present. Perhaps it is an impertinence in me to say that I missed anything, or to suggest any possibility of improvement. If so, Mr. Editor, I fear the heavy responsibility must rest largely on you. You should not have asked me to write on so dangerous a subject. Besides, what is the use of being a wild young American, if one may not amuse himself by casting a sly and harmless stone, now and then, at his older and wiser English brethren? J. T. Sunderland.

COMMUNION ADDRESS.

BY THE REV. C. C. COE.*

The members of this Conference have been hospitably received, and the foreign delegates have been cordially welcomed; and now the thought suggests itself: Is there yet another guest, more or less familiar, more or less foreign to us, to whom our greeting should be extended? The thought is suggested by the words which the seer heard, or fancied that he heard, on the sea-girt rock of Patmos, by the message which he was commissioned to convey to the Church of the Laodiceans: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me."

In what sense can we apply these words to-day? We can apply them in some sense, I suppose. Otherwise we should present the anomaly of a Christian Communion Service without Christ. We may almost come to that if the anticipations of a recent writer be fulfilled. He says:—

> It is certain that the natural and inevitable tendency of historic criticism is to depreciate the influence exerted by personalities on movements. There is nothing so unacceptable to science as a break in the line of development. Probably, one of these days, some writer who is over-educated in the methods of science will succeed in writing a history of Christianity wherein the Founder is almost omitted.†

One sense in which these words might be applied to-day is suggested by Tennyson's description of the Wedding Feast in "In Memoriam":—

> Hearts are warmed and faces bloom
> As drinking health to bride and groom
> We wish them store of happy days.
> Nor count me all to blame if I
> Conjecture of a stiller guest
> Perchance, perchance among the rest
> And though in silence wishing joy.

Some such faith seems to have possessed the early disciples of Jesus. It has been said that—

> When the Christians met at the common meal after the crucifixion, being full of the consciousness of the presence of their Master, in the spirit, they could scarcely fail to think of him as still presiding. Such banquets with unseen guests were among the commonest of the phenomena of Greek and Oriental religion, more especially with regard to the cultus of those who had departed out of life.‡

It would surely add a solemn and ecstatic joy to our Eucharist if we could believe in the presence of such a guest with us to-day. If there be any one here who ventures to believe in such real spiritual presence, let us not count him all to blame.

But however this may be, all will be agreed that this service is a communion with the spirit of the past, both personal and historical. Like all functions which are repeated from time to time, whether frequently or only occasionally, such services are fraught with personal memories which it is well for us to recall. It is true that in the past there were experiences fraught with sadness and bitterness, with the shame of remorse, or with the cruelty of destiny; but, thank God, the sadness has been changed to joy and the bitterness has been transmuted into sweetness, and the shame has been transfigured into glory, and the cruelty has melted into mercy by the lapse of time, and hence the patient sufferer and the penitent sinner, the victim of destiny and the martyr of duty, can all look back upon the travail of their souls and be satisfied. And if this be so, it is still more certain that whatever is joyous or dutiful in the past is idealised by the memory. Ah, well for us if these memories are living forces within us to-day, so that in the passion of youth we retain the innocence of childhood; and in the routine of manhood, the aspirations of youth; and in the physical weakness of age, the at least undiminished spiritual strength of our manhood, so that the continuity of spiritual growth is duly preserved.

To commune with an historical past, is to surround ourselves with a Pantheon of Great Souls—the heroes, the martyrs, the saints; and to be so embued with their spirit that their experience is reproduced in our souls, so that they live again—

> In minds made better by their presence: live
> In pulses stirred to generosity,
> In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
> For miserable aims that end with self,
> In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars
> And with their mild persistence urge man's search
> To vaster issues.

Chief among these, we may place Jesus of Nazareth, who teaches us not only by his quickening words, but by truths which were drawn out in the living characters of his experience; who has enabled us really to believe in a Heavenly Father by showing that it was possible to live the life of a devoted Son of God; whose earthly life was, indeed, exemplary, in that it was inspired by the most earnest piety, rose superior to the most subtle temptations, was devoted to the sweetest charities, filled with the noblest services. It is surely well for us to call him from a dead historic past; to follow him in thought in all his wanderings; to hear his words of cheer and comfort; to sit with him at the paschal feast; to follow him on the way to the cross; to stand near him beneath the cross itself—it is well for us, above all, to admire the transcendent character which this touching story reveals, and thus to be changed into the likeness of the spiritual greatness which we contemplate.

But in entering into communion with the spirit of Christ, it should be remembered that we commune with one who not only once lived, but who still lives. This has been a conviction most pregnant of results.

> The (energising power of the) idea of the risen and exalted Christ is the life-blood of evangelical Christianity. In all ages of the Church it has been the source of the Church's energy and happiness: and in our day it has lost none of its force. Among Churchmen and Dissenters alike it is a never-failing source of inspiration. Great religious movements still take their rise from it. Christian faith and love are still rooted in it.*

Now if this be true, as it undoubtedly is, of Evangelical Christianity, in the common acceptation of that term, it is, or ought to be, equally true of Christian Theism. The story of Christ's resurrection asserts that he died, that he was buried, and that he rose again from the dead. But the Christian Theism, which holds that Death is the gate of Life, that there is "not any even the most temporary extinction of life in the grave," teaches us that Christ never died—that for the spirit there is no such thing as Death, however temporary. Whichever version of the story is true—and on that point I have nothing to say here—the latter faith has the advantage in one respect.

"For," as Dr. Martineau says in one of those pregnant utterances, which have done so much to form my personal convictions, "it is a perilous and even fatal concession to the power of the grave, to admit that it holds anything in non-existence, and absolutely cancels souls; swallowing up every trace of their identity, and necessitating the creation of another, though corresponding series. Once let an object of deep love drop into that abyss and sink into its privative darkness, and how shall I recover it again? Faith stands trembling on the awful brink, and with vain cries and broken supplications owns herself unequal to the task; for, between being and no being, who can fathom the infinite depth? The very creature that has really fallen through it, scarcely can Omnipotence bring back; though it produce another like in every feature, giving us the phantasm and not the essence. But neither to God's power, nor to our faith, does death present any serious perplexity, if it be only the migration of a spirit that does not cease to live."—("Endeavours after the Christian Life," Vol. ii., p. 276–7.)

This conception "opens to our view the diviner sphere of Christ's ascension, wherever it may be, not as a celestial solitude, where he spends the centuries alone, but as the ever-peopling home of men and nations, where predecessors awaited to give him welcome, and disciples go to call him blessed."—("Endeavours." Vol. ii., p. 276.)

If Christ still lives, his great and noble character must needs remain unchanged except by spiritual growth and development. If Christ still lives, he has already spent nearly two millenniums in the unseen world; and we cannot doubt that he has outgrown whatever limitations may have beset him here on earth; he is abreast of the highest spiritual culture known to us to-day. No! not abreast, but, rather, far in advance—leading us ever upward and onward in ceaseless ascension to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God. Such a faith can never become obsolete: the hope which is founded on the realisation of such a faith can never be quenched: the love which is based on such a faith and hope must produce a communion as continuous and as enduring as the immortal life itself.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Martineau's "Tenth Service."

What though for him who filleth heaven and earth there can be no dwelling made with hands;

What though his way is in the deep, and his knowledge too wonderful for us, and before him we are as children that cannot speak;

Yet, touched by the altar's living glow, we learn, as an infant, to lisp his name;

And try the wings that beat for his refuge, and flee as a bird to the mountain.

O Lord, when we cry unto thee from the deep, and wait for thee as they that wait for the morning;

Thou wilt have regard to our entreaty: the sigh of the lowly thou wilt not despise.

Not long, O Lord, shall we feel after thee in these courts below; not long wilt thou hearken to these faltering lips.

Our fathers thou hast called to thy higher praise, and gathered to their fathers must all the children be.

Let the dead and living praise thee, O God above, below: let all the generations praise thee.

Let the glorified company of the first-born, whose names are in the book of life;

Let angels in the height praise thee, who dwellest in the heavens;

Let thy Church on earth praise thee, the delight of whose Wisdom is in the children of men.

* * * *

Lo! at length the True Light,—light for every man born into the world;

Kindling the face of them that receive it, till they become the sons of God.

Cease, blinding glories of the heavens, which none could see and live!

Cease, gross darkness of the earth, where the righteous put forth their hands and fear!

The veil between is taken away, and the mingling day-spring comes;

No longer is the dwelling of Eternal Life too bright above, and the perishable world too dark below.

The Son of God hath dwelt among us, full of grace and truth;

The Son of Man hath gone up on high, made perfect through suffering for the holy of holies.

He is our peace, giving us access by one spirit to the Father;

No more strangers and exiles, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God.

O Lord Almighty! we had said of thee: "Thy thoughts are not as our thoughts;"

But thou hast looked on us as with the pity of a man, and raised us to think the thoughts of God.

We had said, "Our righteousness reacheth not unto thee, or to the holy ones of thy presence;"

But thou hast made one family, there and here; one living communion of seen and unseen.

We had said, "Thou layest men fast in everlasting sleep," but lo! they sleep into everlasting waking.

Blessed be the Lord God, that giveth beauty for ashes, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.

Last week I tried to show you a Great Wonder. This week I want to tell you a Grand Secret.

Did you read about the Queen going to Ireland the other day, in the eighty-first year of her age, and the wonderful welcome she received, as she so well deserved? Nothing, I am sure, has more pleased her good motherly heart so far, than the gathering of those 40,000 children in the Phœnix Park one day, to see her ride slowly past. How they sang! How they cheered! How she smiled with heartfelt joy!

But it was a funny little thing which was said on the day she entered Dublin that I wish to mention. The entry into the city, you know, was a splendid affair. To see it all, thousands upon thousands of men and women stood thick along the roadsides for miles. Thousands more looked down from platforms, walls, railings, roofs and windows. Now one gentleman had taken his little boy, and they had got a good place. But, while they were looking and waiting, the boy suddenly said: "Why, pa, with all these people here, the Queen will never see me!" Not likely! She might see many. She has seen, and she must know very many people. But even a Queen cannot know everybody! Well, then, let me tell you my secret. I call it a secret, because many people don't seem to know it. If we all knew it, and always remembered it, we should everywhere fear to do wrong, we should never fear to do right. Can you guess my secret now? That little girl, who wanted to do something wrong, had learnt the secret when she said: "O I wish—I wish—there was one room in the house where I could go away from God!" God everywhere? Is that the secret? No, that's not it. That God can be everywhere is the Great Wonder. But what would it matter His being everywhere if He didn't know everything? And that's the secret! God always knows. God knows everyone. God knows everything. Not everything you will do to-morrow or next week. Not that! But everything you have done since you were born God knows, and is either sorry or glad.

A great Arabian Chief, long ago, was much loved by his people. And those who knew him best loved him most. He was brave as a lion, gentle as a gazelle, true as a star, generous as the sun. But even he had an enemy. That enemy one day stabbed him. His people would have killed the man at once, but the noble Chief said: "No! If I live, let him live, only if I die, that moment let him die, that our souls may go together before God, for who is right God always knows."

And now let us carefully learn and consider these words of the Psalmist:—

"O Lord, Thou has searched me and known me . . . and art acquainted with all my ways.

Whither shall I go from Thy Spirit? Or whither can I flee from Thy Presence?

Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know thoughts;

And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting."

FORTHCOMING PUBLICATIONS AT THE LONDON BAZAAR.

The Bazaar which is to be opened on Tuesday week, May 1, at the King's Hall, Newton-street, Holborn, promises—we are told by experts—to "beat all the records." The stock of articles in hand is exceedingly large, and the total value must be a great sum. The programme of entertainments, exhibitions, concerts and dramatic performances is equally opulent. Deferring, however, any "forecast" of these, we are now able to give some particulars as to the publications specially prepared for this occasion, and in doing so we hope to interest not only intending visitors to the bazaar, but many readers in all parts of the country.

Certainly the nature of these publications gives them much more than a local or temporary interest. "The Book of the Bazaar" itself, in which the origin of the movement for a new buiding fund is described, and the details of the organisation of the Bazaar itself are given, is far superior to the usual "hand-book," where scrappiness and the ubiquitous advertiser rule supreme. This "Book" is nothing if not neat, and has been designed on lines that will secure its admission to the daintiest of drawing-room tables. Its chief feature, and its more permanent value, will be found in a concise but comprehensive historical sketch, profusely illustrated, of "The London Unitarians and the Churches where they Worship." The portraits of celebrities of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries would alone render this work a most interesting one. Great pains have been taken with the printing, and while the ordinary edition at one shilling will perhaps satisfy most people, a half-crown edition has been prepared, in very superior form and with more durable binding.

A smaller work, but one that is sure to attract much notice is a booklet by Dr. Brooke Herford, entitled "The Lesser and the Larger Unitarianism," in which the author graphically describes the whole movement in Christianity towards the simpler faith of Unitarians, and in his own characteristic way speaks words of "Courage and Cheer" to the brethren in all parts of our particular field. A fine portrait of Dr. Herford, with his autograph attached, adds much to the attractiveness of this booklet, which is to be sold at fourpence.

The third and last of the series is much more substantial, and it represents an endeavour to add to the financial results of the Bazaar something of permanent religious significance. The title—"A Book of Daily Strength"—indicates its character. It gives for every day in the year a page of great and helpful thoughts from the profoundest and most stimulating Unitarian writers. Such a work is probably better fitted than much controversy to give the true spiritual notes of our faith; and whether for use amongst ourselves, or as a "great light" to pass on to others who may not as yet know us truly, this book ought to prove most serviceable. Let us only say further, that here too the purchaser may add beauty to use and get a "superior" copy for 5s., or a plainer and yet good looking one for 3s. 6d. Orders for any of these works may be sent in advance to Essex Hall.

LONDON, APRIL 21, 1900.

NINETY-FIVE YEARS.

It is wonderful to think that on this day, five years hence, we shall celebrate the centenary of the birth of James Martineau. The crown of eighty years, and then of ninety, was granted to him, and in him to us, with a radiance such as seldom rests even upon the chiefest of the "holy and humble men of heart"; and then with each recurring year, amid the divine calmness of that evening time, there came a growing tenderness and a deepening veneration, with wistful thoughts of when the end might be. It came at last, and we thank God for it, in beautiful peace, leaving memories that must satisfy—holy and strengthening and uplifting—and a silent benediction that must rest with growing fulness on all who have received, in any measure, of the richness of his spiritual life.

And now, as we remember that it is his birthday, there is a new thought and a new song of thanksgiving in our hearts. For he, who was in our midst, as leader, teacher, friend, in the truest sense a prophet of the things of God, has passed within the veil of the celestial light; but not to be separated from us, rather to come nearer in more intimate communion, in the hidden fellowship of spirit, while we rejoice to think of that new life into which he has entered in the Household of God, and for ourselves enter more and more completely into the knowledge and the strength of what he has taught us of the life with God.

In his beautiful memorial address at the Leicester Conference, which we published last week, Mr. Stopford Brooke, having spoken of Dr. Martineau's splendid work in the moral and intellectual regions of religious life, expressed an opinion that he was not so much at home, with such easy and natural mastery, in the region of the spiritual life, in which "the nearest approach to God is through Love in us yearning to be at one with the absolute Love from whence it came." We are in no mind at the present moment to pursue any critical inquiry into the question thus raised. That the spiritual life was there, is beyond question, whatever the manner of its expression; and we should be inclined to look for the reason of those differences of style, which Mr. Brooke's fine critical sense has detected, in the reticence and self-distrust of an extremely reserved and sensitive nature, rather than in any ignorance of the theme. That passage concerning "Rest in the Lord," which Mr. Brooke quoted, as expressive of Dr. Martineau's more complete abiding in the world of the Spirit, "closer and closer to the everlasting peace and love," so beautifully characteristic of his latter days, was written while he was still in the thick of the fight, before he had crossed swords with Tyndall, most probably before he had replied to Matthew Arnold in "Why Dissent?" And what the last years actually brought to Dr. Martineau, with the rest of that evening time, and the universal trust and affection that surrounded him, was, we imagine, simply greater freedom of utterance on the most intimate and sacred themes, as of one almost disengaged from all earthly things, in the freedom of love, which is as much of heaven as of earth—and not as much only, but far more. This, we have little doubt, will be made still clearer when the Biography puts us more fully into possession of the secret of his life.

On this day of remembrance we will not add more words, but will rather listen once more to him. And first, in this passage from the sermon on "The Powers of Love":—

> One who lives in converse with Infinite Perfection can neither be without the sympathies that ennoble minds on a lower level, nor surrender itself to any as tyrant over the rest. The springs of his tenderness and strength are ready to be touched by whatever has native claims upon a human heart—by suffering, by beauty, by goodness; nay—so ready, that the fitting love will not be driven back though the suffering be ugly, and the beauty wicked, and the goodness narrow and unattractive. He is not insensible to the shadows of imperfection, but is carried with intenser feeling to the lights of character; for they alone are the soul's realities, and there it is that the promise lies; and as they brighten and spread, the shadows will flee away.
> Entranced with the vision of the Supreme Good, he can never fail to recognise and embrace its broken reflections everywhere; also he can never cease to demand the missing features that are yet withheld; and so it is that this love of his is generous and exacting too; meeting the achievements already made with refreshing response, yet pressing for all that yet remain behind, with a grave arrest of sympathy and an expressive silence till they come. This highest form of love is as well proportioned and discriminative as it is quick and copious; and while flowing freely in to cherish every actual grace, still fixes an asking look upon the possible, under which no earnest conscience can ever sleep. It is a prospective affection, grateful for the present, but thirsting towards the future; and is thus, if not the source, at least the foster-parent of all progressive righteousness. It will suffer no slight to the little child, and casts a tender eye on the rudimentary heaven of his nature; yet will give no rest to the noble youth who had kept all the commandments and yearned for something more. When I am contemplated by this Christ-like spirit, I know that I am regarded with an interest measured by the capacities of my being; and with a love which is in perfect tune with my inward character and has no reservations but from my own unfaithfulness. In proportion as the conditions of my life-problem are fulfilled, as my powers put themselves forth in adequate and fitting activity, as I promptly and truly respond to the demands upon my will, am I animated and upheld by support of the divinest sympathy. And just as far as my nature fails and flags, as I forfeit strength by unresisted temptations and incur shame by degrading compliances and shrink from required sacrifice, do I feel upon me a look which deepens all my guilt and doubles the sadness of my infirmity, and yet silently pleads with me to re-assert the rights which I have impaired, and overtake the march from which I had fallen away.
> Thus, from this highest term, of divine love, there is nothing omitted: it covers, it blends, it modulates, it dignifies, it sweetens all the rest. Hence the chief religious minds have a largeness of their own which, as history shows, gives them a mysterious grasp of other and minor natures, and lifts them, in the moral world, into the same relation to partial forms of character, that, in the intellectual world, the philosopher bears to the specialist, and, in the sphere of Art, Michael Angelo bears to a pattern-designer. The soul in which this commanding affection remains silent may breathe out this or that rich tone, and even its snatches of broken melody; but it is as a lyre without its chief string, or an organ with its central octave dumb; and it can never be adequate to deliver the great masterpieces of human creation, which tax all the powers of performance and comprise all the resources of harmony. The humane, the beautiful, the right, remain only scattered elements of good, till they are gathered into the Divine, and blended into one by the combining love of God.

And again in the sermon on "The Communion of Saints," where he has been speaking of the reverence with which we read the ancient Scriptures, and the goodly company of the "sweet singers" of Christendom:—

> Do not we, the living, take up, in adoration and prayer, the thoughts of the dead, and feel them divinely true? Do they not come forth, as if fresh coined from our own hearts? Indeed, could we ourselves so faithfully utter the consciousness of our inner being, or shape so interpreting a voice for our secret life? What an impressive testimony this to the sameness of our nature through every age, and the immortal perseverance of its holier affections! . . . . These are not merely the accents of the past, but the anthem of the sainted dead—the strains of immortals that look back upon their toils, and behold us singing their songs of sadness here, while they have already learned the melodies of everlasting joy. Blessed communion of earth with Heaven! making us truly one family, below, above; and rendering us fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the very household of God!

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The fifty-fifth annual meeting of this Association was held at Bolton on Good Friday, and was of a most impressive and successful character. There were large gatherings, and the audience at the afternoon business meeting was a record one—there had never previously been so large a one, was the verdict of the oldest teachers present. The Bolton friends had been very busy catering for the material wants of the company, and are to be heartily congratulated upon the comfort and completeness of their arrangements. There was a large congregation in Bank-street Chapel in the morning, when the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., conducted the service. He preached an eloquent sermon, based upon the text "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness."

He said that Good Friday was a fitting day on which to drink of the well of the spirit of Christ. This last year of the nineteenth century was speeding on amid terrible scenes of bloodshed, in which Christian men of kindred race lifted the hand against each other. The thoughts of our people were turned from peaceful progress and from the increase of human happiness and good to military problems, and newspapers were full of the war which was devastating South Africa. From the religious life, and social reform, and philanthropic enterprise, and educational progress, the interest of men was for the time diverted to the war and the life and death struggle between Briton and Boer. It was characteristic of our people in these islands that they were engaged so deeply in whatever was uppermost that they had little energy to spare for other things. Go where you would and you found talk in the train, in the street, in the home, in public meeting, on the one engrossing subject. All minds were fixed upon it. This was, indeed, only natural. So tremendous a national and Imperial crisis had not been upon us since the days of Napoleon Bonaparte. If there were no other reason for our concern, it would lie in the profound feeling of sympathy for the anxious hearts and bereaved homes that multiplied week by week under the devouring hand of weapons of destruction. But all the more need to keep alive in all hearts the true spirit of Christ amid all this contemplation of bloodshed and of the destruction of man by man. There was no duty lying nearer to us to-day than that of applying to the relations between Briton and Boer the spirit of righteousness between man and man, the spirit of doing justly and loving mercy, the spirit indeed, in national as well as private affairs, of doing unto others as we would they should do unto us. That kind of concentration of attention upon the war was demanded from all as our contribution to the great body of public opinion by which the final issues would be decided. But what we needed to guard against was what was nicknamed the "Jingo" spirit. The fighting instinct was soon aroused; the waving of the Union Jack, the singing of "Rule Britannia," of "Britons never shall be slaves," was catching; illustrated newspapers full of pictures of battle and slaughter whetted the appetite; a rage for what was called "military glory" was excited. It got hold especially of the rising generation, growing up under such influences. He did not deny to feeling a strong sense of admiration for the brave self-devotion of those men—equally on both sides in this war—who forgot life and all that was dearest to them in the service of their country; and he had read with sympathetic homage how the rough, uncultivated nature of many a private soldier became in the stress of conflict, with death and suffering on every side, tender and kind and compassionate, ready to lay down life to help a wounded comrade, utterly self-forgetful, lifted by the claims of the hour above himself into heroism. But that was not all, alas! There was, too, the inhuman, passionate, brutalising side of war. There was the mad fever of battle. There was the passion for victory and conquest. There was the thirst for military glory and Imperial power; for nation triumphing over nation, race subjecting race. His fear was that this spirit might be the fruit of this war. God forbid it. With all his soul he prayed that our people might come out of this war true friends of freedom and equality and of goodwill between men. But not only was he deeply concerned that this war should not be demoralising to our national life, but that it should not lay hold of us so completely that we relaxed our interest in other things. The ordinary life of men had to go on in spite of the war. Not only was it their duty to apply the spirit of righteous dealing, as far as their influence extended, to the great national issues involved in the struggle, but he raised his voice on behalf of every Christian cause that as much as ever claimed their active assistance and their earnest interest and attention. It would be a moral disaster if our people were engaged so deeply in the events in South Africa that they had no thought left for home affairs, for all the efforts to lift up and ennoble the people's life, to improve human lots, to enlighten human minds, to elevate human characters. He heard of hospitals and other institutions suffering. While Parliament was full of warlike measures reforms needed by the national life were neglected. There was great need that Christian endeavour should maintain its vital energy. In Christ's mind all outward forms of life were vain in face of the demands of inward spiritual life. There was a battle of life to be fought, against evil, disease, all that defaces character, intemperance, immorality, and Christ was their leader and head; they must march under his banner, and go forth in his spirit. Practical Christian service was the highest warfare in which men can engage. Never had their responsibility been greater with regard to the young. Their idea of glory was to be found on the battle-field; the fighting spirit within them was aroused, and it demoralised; from this teachers must use all the powers they possessed to wean their scholars. They must be inspired with the Christian spirit of self-devotion; and for this teachers must be self-devoted themselves. Christ taught by what he was. Sunday-school teachers must do the same.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The afternoon business meeting was held in the Saleroom, Bowker's-row, Mr. C. C. Grundy, the retiring president, in the chair.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal moved, the President seconded, and Mr. Thomas Holt supported the following resolution, which was unaimously carried:—

That the annual meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association records with sincere and heartfelt regret the loss it has sustained in the death of the Rev. John Wright, B.A., whose services to the Association and to the religious life of our congregations are very gratefully remembered in this district. As far back as the year 1848 he served in the office of visitor to the Association. In 1853 he was editor of the Sunday School Magazine, and joint secretary with the Rev. Joseph Freeston, and in some capacity kept up from his first appointment an unbroken career of useful service till he was elected president in 1869, and on resigning that office he became one of the vice-presidents, and held that office when he died. As a minister faithful to the spirit of Christ, as a teacher of the young and a trainer of men for the ministry, as an author, and in many forms of public and social activity he earned the love and respect of all privileged to work with him, and those who knew him best most deeply grieve over his loss. That this resolution be forwarded to Mr. Wright's two sons.

The President moved the adoption of the report, and in doing so emphasised the Twentieth Century Fund effort, which, if carried through successfully, would be of incalculable benefit to the Sunday-schools; but it could not be successful unless the various constituent schools took the matter up enthusiastically:—

REPORT.

The report contained a full summary of the manifold work of the Association, including the visiting of the schools of the district, lectures and model lessons, and summer rambles, the temperance branch, the publication of "Hymns and Choral Songs," &c., the examination scheme, the Seaside Convalescent Home and the Holiday Home. The Seaside Home at Blackpool had benefited sixty-four children during the year, and there was urgent need of an enlarged, or a second Home for elder children. The accounts of the Home showed an expenditure of £103 18s. 3d., and a balance in hand of £34 2s. 11d. The Holiday Home, which had been carried on under temporary arrangements at Great Hucklow, had been visited by parties from six schools, ranging in number from twenty-five to eighty-nine, for a week each, and had been so thoroughly appreciated that it is proposed to establish a permanent Home. For this and other purposes the committee appeal to the schools for a Twentieth Century Fund of from £1,500 to £2,000, of which it is estimated that £600 will be required for the Home. It is also intended to enlarge the Seaside Home, and to add in other ways to the equipment of the Association. The general account of the Association showed an income of £175 3s. 9d., and a balance of £32 5s. 3d. due to the treasurer, an increase over the previous year due partly to the loss of £13 18s. 6d. on the Holiday Home account. A valuable and detailed Visitor's Report was also appended.

The Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., seconded, and the report was adopted.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal was then elected president, Mr. George H. Leigh treasurer, and the following secretaries:—Mr. David Little, the Rev. John Moore, the Rev. W. R. Shanks, the Rev. G. Evans, the Rev. W. Holmshaw, Mr. J. Reynolds, and Mr. J. H. Pimley.

The Chairman moved that the thanks of the Association be given to the Rev. H. E. Dowson, the preacher of the morning, and expressed his own gratitude for what had been said on the subject of the war.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond, in seconding the resolution, said that for his part he rejoiced infinitely in the fact that Mr. Dowson had spoken as he had done. He would be rejoiced none the less even if he had been a Conservative of the very deepest dye, as would any man who had a spark of Christian feeling latent in his breast. The subject bristled with controversy and had excited the strongest passions, but they felt that Mr. Dowson had struck chords too seldom sounded in their national life. The one grave omission in their National Conference at Leicester was the avoidance of the subject of the war. The Manchester Association had a little more Christian courage. There might be large differences of opinion amongst them both as to the past and future policy, but what Mr. Dowson had said was what all Christian ministers should say to their people.

The resolution was adopted amid loud applause.

Mr. Dowson responded, saying that he should feel strongly that their Christianity was played out if a preacher could not speak the word of Christian righteousness, which he felt was demanded, in face of a great national crisis.

The meeting then welcomed representatives from kindred associations, including Miss Marion Pritchard (London Sunday School Society), Mr. Ion Pritchard (Sunday School Association), Mr. J. Kimberley (Midland Sunday School Association), the Rev. E. R. Hodges (North Midland Sunday School Association), the Rev. F. Allen (South-Eastern Sunday School Union), and the Rev. E. C. Jones (Yorkshire United Sunday School Union). Through Mr. and Miss Pritchard the meeting sent a hearty greeting to the Associations in the United States, whose meetings they are about to attend.

An invitation from Gorton to hold the next Good Friday meetings there was heartily accepted. The business was concluded by the distribution of "long service" medals to teachers who had been engaged continuously in Sunday-school work twenty years and upwards. These medals were provided by Mr. C. C. Grundy, and his generosity and interest were much appreciated.

EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was held in Bank-street Chapel, and was presided over by Mr. Thomas Harwood. A hearty vote of thanks was passed to the Bolton friends who had so admirably discharged the duties of host. Miss Edith Gittins, of Leicester, who was to have read a paper, was unavoidably absent; but she kindly sent her paper, which was read by Miss Marian Pritchard in her stead as follows:—

USE, WITHOUT ABUSE, OF A HOLIDAY HOME PARADISE.

With the request that I should speak to you to-day came the suggestion of the subject that would be most acceptable, and any reasons I may have had for declining were overcome by the interest and sympathy I feel in your Holiday Home scheme, and also by my profound desire that the very best may result from so right and beautiful an effort to bring the children of your big busy Lancashire towns into living relations with

> Nature, of the inner man
> Best ally and partisan.

In face of the evils which spring from the present "set" of population towards the cities—the overcrowding, the artificial pleasures, the unhealthy excitements, the intemperance, immorality and disease; the rearing of children in squalor, their baby feet on mud or paving stones instead of on the green grass; the sunshine seen through smoke, the air of heaven smelling of tobacco, the divorce from Nature's glories of growth and seasons; the summer, which should tell of quivering leaf-shadows, of wild roses and scent of honeysuckle, a time merely for heat and dust; the winter, without its lovely suggestions of purity and promise, the time of dirty snow and bad weather; the ignorance of little slum children of the simplest natural facts and happenings—in face of all these things we are driven by shere pity to seek out and apply means of alleviation and of remedy.

The duty, the task, of endeavouring to improve the conditions of existence for the dwellers in our large towns is outside the lines of to-night's discussion, but we must recognise these conditions if we are to appreciate the benefits which may be hoped for, prayed for, worked for through the establishment of such blessed places of refuge as your Holiday Home in Peakland. "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth." Forward-looking thoughts behold an endless procession of happy creatures, who, sojourning in your "House Beautiful," and getting some knowledge of what God's heaven and earth are like, depart, strengthened with memories, and hopes, and new conceptions of good, which shall help them to vanquish the Apollyons which lie in wait ahead of them—help, indeed! A week's holiday is so much longer than seven days—so much more than seven times one!—for does it not hold the nights as well as the days—sunset, sunrise, and all the solemn hours between?

> Here shall the wizard moon ascend
> The heavens, in the crimson end
> Of day's declining splendour; here
> The army of the stars appear.

The last twitter of the birds, the falling of the dew, the country night-silence, so wonderful to ears accustomed to the never-ceasing din of the streets—these instead of the crowded train journey and late home-coming, after the long day of fatigue and excitement, which make the one-day excursion a doubtful good and frequent source of physical and moral mischief. It is great gain when workers realise this more excellent way of spending their precious allowance of holiday time; when they save money, and consult books, and maps, and friends, as to the quiet spot inland, or by the sea, where they shall spend their week, instead of joining chance companions in eighteen-hour trips to Blackpool or Skegness. It is great gain to discover that the best things are for all who desire and seek them, without money and without price. "The blue sky above you, and the sweet waters and flowers of the earth beneath, and mysteries and presences innumerable of living things—these may be here your riches, untormenting and divine." Permit me yet another digression as to possible ultimate results. It may well be that love of the country, inherited from parents or grandparents, till then latent and unknown "first affections, shadowy recollections," may, thanks to you, re-awaken, and have force to enable lads and lassies to escape from the vortex of town life, and to settle once more on the land, either in England or beyond sea, among the labours and the joys of simple, natural human existence.

I am counting the chickens before they are hatched: let me return to the contemplation of the eggs!

With a heart full of sympathy I realise the unending care and difficulty which your undertaking involves—the call for perennial wisdom, kindness, and capacity on the part of the managers of your large school parties. "Seventy to eighty scholars and teachers," I see, are to live together for the holiday week, to be preceded and followed by innumerable other groups of like dimensions. My own experience in this matter has been limited to much smaller numbers of guests, so I speak with diffidence, but at the same time with the hope that discussion of difficulties by this large representative gathering may do something to help towards the harmonious, successful working of your beneficent scheme, by the endeavour to arrive at oneness of aim and purpose, a standard of control and a standard of conduct. We all know how difficult these are to attain in any system of voluntaryism, how in controlling a body of children Mr. A permits what Mr. B condemns, while Miss C takes no notice of peccadilloes which Miss D detests. Authority wears thereby an air of arbitrariness and caprice, instead of being enthroned as august, immutable, unquestioned. Friction occurs among rulers and among ruled—"the bond of peace" is dependent on "unity of spirit." It goes without saying that you will all wish that your children and young people shall get the greatest possible amount of good from their stay at the Holiday Home. But even parents, animated by purest goodwill, do not always pull with the same rope, and interpretations of good differ widely.

You will hope to strengthen bodies with good plain fare, and "medicinal fresh air and pure water," happy exercise, and the sleep of wholesome fatigue; to instruct and inform minds, through misfortune unacquainted with aspects of Nature that should be part of the universal heritage, and you will long to quicken spirits into admiration, hope and love. It is a great programme! How infinitely much depends on you teachers, for as the teacher so the taught will be! I think of the first—in some ways easiest—part of the business; of the cleverness wanted, the need of the organising faculty, the great importance of establishing and maintaining right precedents as to order, neatness, cleanliness, self-help, social help, punctuality, moderation, and good manners, if it is to be a Home and not a house, and if the meals are not to be scrambles.

Will you think it an absurd Counsel of Perfection if I suggest that it shall be a rule not to grumble about the weather? In my youth I was the proud possessor of a wise farmer uncle, who had been trained by an equally wise farmer uncle. With admiration and respect I recall his unshaken equanimity as, when the hay was about, he would tap the glass and, perhaps, find it steadily going down—or see it at "Set Fair" when the turnips were perishing of drought. I fear I have maintained the tradition very imperfectly, but I often regret our exaggerated talk and our self-centredness—how someone says "it is pouring" when a slight rain is falling—how we seem unable to take a wider view than of the state of our boots and umbrellas, and to rise to the notion that it is much more important that the meadows and cornfields should have what they want than that we should. An American said that Britishers had "no weather—they only had samples." If our "sample" at Great Hucklow is not a good one (and everybody cannot be lucky!) we must make the best of it and rejoice over the better fortune of others, and find "a hope for times that are unkind and every season." It is also to be wished that the special and peculiar joys of autumn and winter may be recognised. All the school parties cannot, I imagine, be housed between April and September. Let those who go earlier or later refrain from self-pity. I like those lines of Robert Louis Stevenson's:—

> To make this earth—our hermitage,—
> A cheerful and a changeful page,
> God's bright and intricate device
> Of days and seasons doth suffice.

And Emerson says: "Not the sun or the summer alone, but every hour and season yields its tribute of delight."

I observe in your circular the very proper intimation that "all damage to the property of the Association shall be made good." Will there be an unwritten law, equally binding, relating to possible damage to woods and banks, hedges and heathland? Here is a real and serious danger. You can pay for broken window-panes and new tea-cups, but there is no replacing fern, primrose, cowslip roots, and the rest, if they are once grubbed up to perish miserably in the impossible conditions to which it is attempted to transfer them. Our town children are splendidly mindful of the regulations in public parks and gardens as to not touching or gathering; but they, with too many of their elders, appear to think that any country place may be harried and injured without compunction. There is a general idea that birds' nests should not be taken, and that birds and squirrels should not be "shied" at; but every wild flower is fair prey, and the more they can carry off the better. Unless you are of another mind the Garden of Eden before you will soon be a desolate wilderness; the charm which drew you thither will in large part disappear, and every succeeding party of children will inherit a diminishing treasury of ennobling joys. With regard to these things there are three planes of existence—the don't-see and don't-care, the see-and-want-to-grab, and the Wordsworth-Emerson-Ruskinian plane, to which we must endeavour to lift ourselves and all others, if our England is not to be denuded of its wealth of beauty. Make your Holiday-Homers feel that a very few carefully chosen and carefully gathered flowers give more pleasure than barbarous handfuls, and that these are all that can be spared as their share; that the sight of the hyacinth in the woods and the primrose stars on the banks is for others as much as for them; that they are in honour bound to preserve and not to destroy. Never about Great Hucklow must be seen blossoms gathered and dropped to fade, never papers left to vulgarise the roads and fields. As to butterflies, let us hear one of Mr. Ruskin's racy exhortations:—

Ever since I have known children or heard talk of them, I have noticed that they liked running after butterflies, and are represented in poetical vignettes as if that were an amiable occupation of theirs. I would give any child I had the care of a good horsewhip or pony-whip cut over the shoulders if I caught it running after a butterfly. The way to see a butterfly is, as for everything else, to see it alive. If you're quiet enough, it will settle under your nose or on your sleeve, and if it is a rare one, and you don't kill it, it will be less rare next year, until you may have purple emperors flying about as plentiful as now you have smuts. But also, when you've got it and pinned it wriggling on a cork, what's the good of it? . . . A precious sort of thing to catch and transfix what poor little life and succulent pleasure the creature has evermore out of its body, that you may pin it on your hat, and say it's the Jackiana Tomfooliensis!

The more children are accustomed to the sight of natural beauty the less desire have they to despoil it. The destruction we lament comes chiefly from our wretched herding into towns. The poor children let loose are like a bull in a china shop; they don't know and can't know the mischief they do, because they have no idea of the preciousness of the things they injure. They must be taught, trained, helped to see, to hear, to enjoy. If you mean to prevent your Paradise being turned, very soon, into common ground, it is necessary for you, without checking light-hearted merriment, light-footed activity and reasonable freedom to make "an unescapable law of wise restraint." Every bird that builds its nest in your vicinity, and returns thither spring after spring, every uncurling fern and foxglove spire will be an outward and visible sign of the inward and spiritual grace you foster.

By acquainting your children with beautiful Nature you make them potential inheritors of the great treasure of Poetry, and who can estimate the joy that may come thereby! We all know sad, amusing stories of the misconceptions of childish minds—imagination working without knowledge. To choose an example as familiar as is possible—what but words to the town-imprisoned boy or girl can be the delightful images in the noblest of elegies? To recall a few of these:—

> The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
> The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed.
> The cool sequestered vale.
> Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
> Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has broke;
> How jocund did they drive their team afield!
> How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!

Equally forlornly destitute of meaning must be the lovely legacies of Wordsworth and of Tennyson, to mention only two more of our native singers.

I must pass by, in a sentence merely, the chances you will give of quickening the impulse to produce beautiful things. Nature is the foundation, the root, the indispensable original of Art. If eyes are not blessed with the sight of her handiwork, if her curves and her colours are not familiar joys, imagination has no material. Out of nothing, nothing comes.

And Religion? She is a spirit of such heaven-born vigour that she walks strong and beautiful where Art cannot breathe, for, where duty is done and where love is, there is she, in poorest attic, in ugliest street. But, nevertheless, she can there tell the half, only, of her message. She delights to woo us forth to hills and streams, and murmurous woods, and into the silence beneath the stars; and there to whisper to us the Gospel of God and make us conscious of the Eternal Power that is above all, and through all, and in all the Human Kindness and the glory of the world.

> A motion and a spirit that impels
> All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
> And rolls through all things.

The capacity of children for this God consciousness is not large: do not expect their cups to hold more than a very little, but still let them share as far as they are able your sincere feeling, your admiration and delight. Do not be content with feeding the bodily life only: give them food for the spirit too. Lead their thoughts, as well as their feet, into new and wonderful places, and you will confer upon them a benefit that will outlast the week's junketing, and be life and hope for future years. The young people of an older growth should have a sense of greater responsibility—let them have dearer privileges of friendship and intimacy. This companionship for a week at a time gives us opportunities for knowing each other, and for learning the circumstances and the surroundings of life, which more casual meetings can never afford, and of establishing lasting relations of affection and respect. The interests and memories shared in common will be a bond for ever.

We older ones must make available on these occasions every little store of knowledge we possess, share without stint every good thought, our love of Nature in its parts and in its whole, and give to the undertaking, not our time and strength only, but ourselves. Do what we may, it is the merest mite towards meeting a great and pressing necessity—this nature-famine from which our children are suffering, and which threatens to become even more acute. But the evil is recognised, eyes are opened, hearts are eager to help, many an effort on the same lines as yours is being made by individuals and by societies; there is a divine discontent abroad, which is an inspiration from the Father of Mercies. His blessing of peace and increase will surely be on those who, in this way, are set "both to will and to do of his good pleasure."

The Rev. Charles Peach opened a discussion, and narrated how the Great Hucklow Holiday Home had been initiated. For some years past, at Sheffield, Norwich and Manchester, he has been in the habit of taking children into the country or to the seaside for a week's holiday, and he gave the audience the results of his experience, which were all in favour of developing the Holiday Home scheme and stamping it with permanence.

The Rev. E. R. Hodges, who had recently been in the neighbourhood of Great Hucklow, referred to the store of Nature's marvels in flowers and rocks that he found there, and suggested that with each party there should be someone who had a knowledge of botany and of geology.

The Revs. S. H. Street and J. W. Bishop also spoke of their personal experiences in taking poor children into the country for summer holidays, and it may be taken for granted that the Association has now pledged itself to see this Great Hucklow Holiday Home scheme through; and we are glad to hear that donations are coming in in response to the appeal recently sent out to Sunday-school sympathisers of this district.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The fifty-third annual meeting of this Association was held at Derby on Easter Monday, and was well attended. The business meeting was held in the morning in the Friar-gate Schoolroom, the president, the Rev. J. K. Smith, of Belper, in the chair, who, in opening the proceedings, spoke of the valuable work done in the past year, and agreed with what their visitor, Miss Gittins, had said in her report, as to the great importance of Bible teaching in the schools, which should be carried on in a much more thorough manner than was often the case at present.

The Rev. H. E. Haycock, secretary, read the Committee's report, which showed that the question of the formation of Young People's Religious Unions in the schools had been under earnest consideration, but that various reasons, and among them a prospective change of secretary had delayed progress. The Committee noted with pleasure that in several schools active steps had been taken in organising the young people into a closer religious fellowship, and that successful branches of the Young People's Religious Union were already established at Derby, Sheffield, Nottingham, and elsewhere. The attendance returns had, as usual, been collected and tabulated, showing an increase in the total number of scholars during the last five years, but a falling-off in the number of teachers, not large, it is true, but sufficiently large to be a matter of regret, especially in view of the urgent need that exists in many schools for a more numerous and efficient staff. A successful and well-equipped Sunday-school was evidence of the healthy life of the Church, and a disinclination on the part of a congregation to maintain its Sunday-school at the highest point of efficiency was a sure sign that some elements of real vitality were wanting.

Regret was expressed that the secretary was about to leave Loughborough, and that Mr. S. H. Gittins, who had rendered invaluable services to the Association, had left the district.

The treasurer's balance-sheet showed £1 10s. 8d. in hand.

The Rev. H. Gow, in moving the adoption of the report, expressed great regret at the prospect of their losing Mr. Haycock from the district.

The Rev. E. A. Maley seconded, and dwelt on the importance of definite doctrinal teaching. This was also emphasised by the Rev. J. E. Manning.

Votes of thanks were passed to the retiring secretary, and the treasurer (Mr. Gittins), and the officers were elected, with Mr. E. J. Chapman as president, and the Rev. W. Whitaker as secretary.

A welcome was accorded the Rev. W. E. Atack, the Rev. F. Allen, and Mr. Fred. Clayton, representing Manchester, London and S.E. Counties, and Yorkshire Associations respectively, and these gentlemen briefly responded. It was decided that the next annual meeting should be at Belper.

After luncheon service was held in Friargate Chapel, conducted by the Rev. W. Whitaker, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. John Byles, of Northampton.

In the evening a conference was held, under the presidency of the Rev. J. K. Smith, when a paper was read by the Rev. Charles Roper on "The Esprit de Corps of the Sunday-school."

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The following are the members of the Conference Committee, so far as it has been completed by the nomination of representatives of district and other societies:—

President: Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter.

Vice-Presidents: Mr. J. R. Beard and Dr. W. Blake Odgers.

Treasurer: Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke.

Secretaries: Mr. A. W. Worthington, Mr. C. Fenton, Rev. F. W. Stanley, and Rev. J. Ellis.

Twelve members elected at Leicester: Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Mr. E. Clephan, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, Rev. W. H. Drummond, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. H. P. Greg, Rev. C. Hargrove, Dr. Brooke Herford, Miss Florence Hill, Rev. J. C. Street, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Rev. Joseph Wood.

Representatives of Societies (so far as reported): Rev. A. Chalmers, Yorkshire Union; Mr. John Dendy, Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Assembly; Rev. R. T. Herford, N. and E. Lancashire Unitarian Mission; Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Manchester District Association; Rev. B. C. Constable, E. Cheshire Christian Union; Rev. Henry Gow, North Midland Association; Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, Midland Christian Union; Rev. W. G. Tarrant, London Provincial Assembly; Mr. G. H. Clennell, London District U.S.; Mr. H. Blessley, Southern Unitarian Association; Miss Tagart, Central Postal Mission; Mr. L. N. Williams, S.E. Wales Unitarian Society; Mr. J. Graham, Scottish Unitarian Association.

In addition to the message received at Leicester from the Queen, Dr. Blake Odgers has since received from the Prince of Wales the following acknowledgment of the resolution of sympathy:—"O.H.M.S. To the President, Conference of Unitarian and Free Churches, Leicester. I warmly thank for kind congratulations. —Albert Edward."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—Friends of temperance will be glad to know that the first meeting of the Band of Hope was held in the schools on Wednesday, April 11, the membership being seventy-five and the attendance sixty. The Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, delivered the inaugural address, which was listened to with great attention by the children. Two hymns from the Essex Hall "Songs and Hymns" were sung, names were entered on the books, and the whole meeting was pronounced very successful. Miss Dowsing is superintendent and Mr. Tranter president. It is proposed to hold meetings weekly, and to give an occasional tea. Special attention is asked to the formation of this society, as a letter in The Inquirer last autumn pointed out publicly the lack of any such organisation connected with this church.

Boston.—Last Sunday, in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. W. Stoddart, who was to have officiated, the service at Spain-lane Chapel was acceptably conducted by Miss Bontoft.

Bury.—The congregation of Bank-street Chapel passed the following resolution on Sunday last:—"That this meeting of the members of the Bank-street congregation, Bury, desires to put on record its deep sense of sorrow at the decease of their late beloved and respected pastor, the Rev. John Wright, B.A., who ministered among them for twenty years. The members of this congregation will ever remember his unwearied labours on their behalf, his great missionary zeal for the spread of those views of Christianity which recommended themselves to his heart and mind, his noble activity in every good cause in this town and district, as well as the wisdom, geniality and devotion which marked his tenure of the pastorate. They look back upon his ministry in Bury as one of the most prosperous periods in their existence, and trust that his bright example, his living words preserved upon the printed page, and the memory of his enthusiastic and self-sacrificing toil will be a precious and lasting inheritance to succeeding generations of worshippers upon this spot." On Sunday week school anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. Douglas Walmsley, B.A., and on the following evening a social meeting was held in the schools to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Walmsley, on the occasion of their visit among old friends. At the same time a presentation was made to Mr. Fred. Crawshaw, of a black marble timepiece, on his resignation of the superintendentship of the boys' school after nine years' service. Mr. Thomas Holt, who presided, Messrs. F. Crawshaw, W. Stephenson, L. Wilde, J. Taylor and the Rev. J. Collins Odgers joined in expressions of warm welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Walmsley, and in grateful reminiscences of his work at Bury. Mr. Walmsley replied, and spoke with thankfulness of the results of their steady work in the schools, which years afterwards were apparent in the lives of those about them. Mr. Crawshaw subsequently acknowledged with much feeling the gift he had received.

Chester (Resignation).—The Rev. H. D. Roberts has resigned the pulpit of Matthew Henry's Chapel, having accepted the offer of the Liverpool District Missionary Association to be their missionary minister. The change takes place at the end of September.

Gateacre.—A memorial brass on a mounting of marble has recently been fixed in the chapel. The following is the inscription:—"In memory of the Rev. George Beaumont, born Sept. 3, 1833, died Nov. 22, 1897. In the last thirty-four years of his life as minister of this chapel he won the reverent love of its members, and of the dwellers in this district by his faithful service for the public good. In public an earnest teacher of the Gospel, and an active and conscientious citizen, he was always a high example of Christian charity, and his memory is blessed. To hand down to coming generations the record of his pure and self-sacrificing career this tablet is erected by members of this congregation and other friends. In memory also of his beloved wife, Rachael Bond Beaumont, his untiring helper in all good works, who died Feb. 27, 1898, aged 64 years. In death they were not divided."

Great Hucklow.—A very successful sale of work was held on Saturday and Monday, April 14 and 16. On the first day the sale was opened by Mr. John Kerfoot, of Dukinfield, the Rev. W. H. Rose in the chair. The sale was opened on Monday by the Rev. L. Scott, of Great Hucklow. The proceeds of the sale amounted to about £30 which is t be devoted to the building fund for the erection of a new schoolroom.

Hale (Cheshire).—The work of a very busy winter was brought to a close on Wednesday, 11th inst, by a congregational re-union in the big schoolroom, on the invitation of the minister, the Rev. T. Robinson. The gathering was of an encouraging character, and was addressed, among others, by the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., of Altrincham, Mr. R. H. Wolff, Mr. A. Nicholson, and the minister. Throughout the winter the two schoolrooms (the smaller one having been restored last summer) have been open practically every week-evening for meetings and classes in connection with the Institute and Social Union, the Band of Hope, the choir, football and cricket clubs. There have been regular classes in drawing, needlework, musical drill for boys and girls, reading and recreation room for juveniles, adult reading and recreation room, dramatic class, and children's singing class. In connection with this class the girls from eight to fourteen years of age have made for themselves Japanese costumes, and taken part in providing three entertainments, giving picturesque displays with fan, lantern, and umbrella drill, and tableaux based on Japanese home life. The Band of Hope has been active and efficient, holding several gatherings, and meeting fortnightly for "socials" and entertainments. The choir, under their painstaking leader the organist, Mr. Mossop, have done good work. At the Christmas Sunday-school party there was a larger attendance than at any previous party, and there seems every prospect, if a larger band of regular teachers can be secured, of steady growth in this branch of the work, both in numbers and efficiency. It is encouraging to report also that with the increase of population in the neighbourhood there are additions to the list of members of the congregation. The minister, whose health has suffered somewhat from stress of work and the influenza epidemic, has now gone for a holiday in Italy, and will return at the end of May.

Hollywood (near Birmingham).—An excellent concert and dramatic entertainment was given at the Kingswood School on the 9th, in aid of the Indian Famine Fund. The sum of £3 6s. was realised. The entertainment was arranged and conducted by Miss Edith Townley.

Kentish Town.—On Easter Sunday, in the absence of the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, Mr. Armytage Bakewell conducted the services at the Free Christian Church, giving in the morning a discourse on the all but Universal Belief from the earliest times in a Future Life, translated by the Apostles and early Christians from their faith in the Resurrection of Jesus into an enthusiasm which had rendered the foundation and spread of Christianity possible in spite of every obstacle; and in the evening reading a beautiful sermon of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's on "The Living Christ."

Leigh: Lancashire.—The new organ was opened on Wednesday week by Mr. F. L. Bax, A.R.C.O., of Manchester. Mr. Alderman Phillips, J.P., of Salford, presided, and was accompanied on the platform by the Revs. A. H. Dolphin (minister), R. T. Herford, B.A., and Dr. Karfoot (Congregationalist). The instrument has cost £225, the whole of which has been raised. The case has been specially designed to suit the church, the woodwork being of pine and pitch pine. The proceedings at the opening were very successful.

Liverpool Sunday School Society. — The annual meeting and soirée were held at the Unitarian Institute, on Tuesday, April 10, the Rev. W. J. Jupp (President) in the chair. There were over sixty members and friends present. The report of the council, read by the hon. sec., showed that good work had been done during the year. Another school had affiliated itself with the society—namely, Garston; this school had only started during the year and had already forty children on the books. The Ullet-road Church Sunday-school, with fifty-seven children, took the place of Renshaw-street School, which had been given up during the year. The statistics of the twelve schools were very satisfactory, there being 1,946 scholars on the books, with an average afternoon attendance of 1,364. After the business the visitor for the year, Miss R. M. Beaumont, of Gateacre, gave a most admirable and detailed report of her visits to the different schools, in many cases sketching the lessons she had heard given, and showing that really good teaching was being done in the majority of the classes Miss Beaumont was delighted to find the scholars all so happy in their schools and their behaviour, on the whole, good and orderly. A vote of thanks to Miss Beaumont, moved by Dr. Klein and seconded by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, brought the meeting to a close.

London: Essex Church.—As already announced, the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will preach at Essex Church, the Mall, Kensington, on the six Sunday mornings beginning May 27 and ending July 1. The Church Committee have arranged that seat-holders' pews will be reserved till ten minutes to eleven, after which time the church will be open to any who attend. All the gallery seats are unappropriated. It is not intended to issue any cards for reserved seats.

Monton (Resignation).—The congregation of Monton Church has accepted, with deep regret and many expressions of good will and sympathy, the resignation of the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., who feels compelled to retire through continued ill-health after a pastorate of fifteen years.

Oxford.—A Communion service was held in the Church of the Divine Love on the Thursday before Good Friday. On Good Friday the hours of service were as on Sunday, and the evening congregation was as good or better than the usual evening congregation.

Pontypridd.—On Sunday, April 8, anniversary services were held, and Mrs. Ormiston Chant preached morning and evening. In the evening there was a large congregation. The discourses were thoughtful, earnest, and helpful, and were very much appreciated. On the following Monday evening Mrs. Chant delivered an interesting lecture in the new Town Hall, on "America as seen through an Englishwoman's eyes." The lecture was well received and much applauded.

Portsmouth: St Thomas's-street. — The annual congregational tea-party was held on Good Friday. Over 100 sat down to tea, after which about 200 friends in all were present. A selection of sacred music was given by the choir, assisted by local talent. Mr. T. Bond presided, and gave an account of the past year's work. While they lost by deaths and removals several who regularly attended the services, others had taken their places, the main effort now being to get young people interested. There had recently been a gradual increase in the attendances, which augured well for the future. Some of the members of the Portsmouth P.S.A. had a table at the tea.

Rotherham.—On Thursday, April 12, a bazaar was held in the schoolroom of the Church of Our Father, to provide additional accommodation and new heating apparatus for the schools. Mrs. Manning, of Sheffield, presided, and was supported by the Rev. W. Stephens, and six children who opened the bazaar, two of them—a girl and a boy—making speeches. After the presentation of bouquets the sale proceeded.

Saffron Walden.—On Good Friday the sixty-third annual tea and public meeting were held in the General Baptist Chapel, the attendance being larger than for some years past. The public meeting commenced at seven p.m., when every seat in the chapel was occupied. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth presided, and in introducing the programme, said theirs was the oldest annual tea-meeting not only in the town but also in the district by a number of years, it had attained the advanced age of sixty-three years. It was as old as himself, and it was commenced in the same year as our beloved Queen ascended the Throne. He had himself entered upon the twenty-sixth year of his ministry in the town. During the quarter of a century he had preached 4,000 sermons and taught 3,000 times in the Sunday-school. On March 25 he delivered a special sermon upon the Christian ministry, when there was not one single person present who attended the services in March, 1875. Since the congregation was founded in 1711, there had been eight ministers, whose pastorates averaged twenty years. The present ministry had exceeded this average. He then read letters from the Mayor (Mr. Joseph Bell), Messrs. E. B. Gibson, J.P., C.C., and D. Barton, Town Councillor, Dr. Courteny Kenny, Downing College, Cambridge, and others, expressing their regret for inability to be present, and their good wishes. Early in the meeting the Rev. A. J. Marchant, of Deptford, Junior Messenger of the General Baptist Assembly of England and Wales, came forward by request, saying he had been asked to undertake a pleasant duty on behalf of the church and friends in the town. He then bore his testimony to the important and responsible work Mr. Brinkworth had done and was doing. When the General Baptist Assembly knew that it was the "Silver Wedding" of their Senior Messenger's pastorate with that church, they at once requested him with his brother messenger, the Rev. W. H. Smith, of London, to attend this annual gathering and convey their highest appreciation of Mr. Brinkworth's services, and to express their desire for his lengthened life to them, and to that church and town. At the conclusion of his remarks he called upon two members of the congregation, Mr. A. Gilbey and Mr. A. Osborne, who, on behalf of the congregation, asked Mr. Brinkworth to accept a small token of their high esteem. Mr. Gilbey then presented to Mr. and Mrs. Brinkworth a solid silver tea service, engraved with the following inscription:—"Presented to the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, by the Congregation and Friends of the General Baptist Chapel, Saffron Walden, as a recognition of 25 years ministry. 13th April, 1900." Mr. Osborne then handed Mr. Brinkworth a cheque subscribed by the congregation and friends in the town. Mr. Brinkworth, who has been the recipient of other gifts from his friends in the town and elsewhere, responded with much feeling, and the programme was then completed with some omissions owing to the lateness of the hour. The meeting was closed with prayer by the Rev. A. J. Marchant.

Stockport.—The Rev. B. C. Constable has just completed a series of six Sunday evening discourses on "The Religion of Jesus in the Light of the recent Correspondence between Dr. Mivart and Cardinal Vaughan." These were reported in the local press, and called forth several letters, to which Mr. Constable replied. Large congregations were present. In March last a Women's Social Meeting was inaugurated in connection with the church, when about forty women sat down to tea, and enjoyed a pleasant social evening. These meetings are to be continued monthly. Last Sunday the minister preached on the subject of the Triennial Conference both morning and evening.

MR. PROTAB CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR, who is on his way to attend the International Council of Unitarians at Boston, Mass., is expected to be in London by Friday of the present week. It is hoped that Mr. Mozoomdar will preach at Highgate on Sunday morning or evening, but at the time of going to press it is not yet known whether this will be possible. If it can be arranged, the fact will be advertised in Saturday's Daily News.

THE annual meetings of the Baptist Union have been held during the week at Bloomsbury Chapel, Dr. Clifford, the retiring President, introducing his successor, the Rev. W. Cuff, of Shoreditch. Dr. McLaren, of Manchester, was elected vice-president, which means that he will next year succeed to the chair of the Union. It was reported that very satisfactory progress had been made with the Twentieth Century Fund. The President took as the subject of his address: "The Holy Spirit, the Life and Power of our Institutions." They were all at one, he said, in holding to the essentials of Jesus Christ and his saving gospel to men; but he thought that the one great want of the hour was "a primitive and real faith in the abiding presence and power of the Spirit in the modern Church." He then reaffirmed his faith in the Bible as "true, infallible and absolutely perfect, as it came from the mind and heart of Him who gave it," and proceeded to make some not very wise remarks about modern criticism. He was on firmer ground when he appealed for a people who should not be forgetful of God:—

> The people of England are forgetting God and living without hope and without God in the world. Materialism, Imperialism and pleasure are absorbing the national life. Our places of worship are almost forsaken, and our Sabbaths are spent in anything and everything but the public worship of God. You will say, "This is pessimism with a vengence." No, brethren, I am no pessimist. Those who know me best know that I am the most hopeful of men and perfectly confident of the final issues at stake. But we must face the actual condition of things, or we shall never fall back on the old apostolic plan and power which alone can change the condition of men and things. Only let us believe in the presence and power of the Holy Ghost in all our churches and the blessed change will come.

THE centenary of Cowper's death was celebrated at Olney on Wednesday. The little town was gaily decorated, and in the course of the proceedings some hundreds of school children were assembled in front of Cowper's house, to hear an address on the poet's love of animals, and to sing his hymn, "God moves in a mysterious way." They were then each presented with a penny "Life" of Cowper, and a penny copy of his poems. The house in the Market-place, where Cowper lived for nearly twenty years, has been presented by the owner to the town, and the deeds were formerly handed over to the trustees on Wednesday, in the Congregational Church (the Cowper memorial church), after which Mr. Clement Shorter delivered an interesting address on the poet. The house now contains a Cowper museum, which was also formally opened. In the evening Dean Farrar preached a special sermon in the parish church.

ON Tuesday, March 20, as we learn from the Interpreter and from Unity and the Minister, a meeting was held in the hall of the Calcutta University Institute, in memory of Dr. Martineau. The chair was taken by Dr. Welldon, the Bishop of Calcutta, and among the speakers were Babu Protab Chunder Mozoomdar, who moved a memorial resolution, Mr. N. N. Ghoze, Principal of the Metropolitan Institution, Dr. P. K. Ray, of Presidency College, Babu K. C. Banerji, the Hon. Dr. Gurudas Banerji and the Rev. A. Tomory. Mr. A. M. Bose and others, unable to be present, sent messages of sympathy. The Bishop, in opening the proceedings, said that he was aware that his presence on that occasion might give rise to misunderstanding, but while separated from Dr. Martineau on points of doctrine, which he held to be vital to Christianity, he felt it right that honour should be done to the intellectual and spiritual eminence of Dr. Martineau, a man of exalted piety, whose writings were known to all cultivated people of the English speaking world. The following are further passages from Dr. Welldon's speech:—

> I would claim for him among modern writers a unique position in the construction and illumination of the principles upon which all religion depend; for it must not be forgotten that the possibility of religion, and especially of revelation, ultimately lies in the constitution of human nature itself. No other modern English writer whom I can think of, unless it be Bishop Butler, has done so much as Dr. Martineau to exhibit what I may perhaps describe as the internal evidences of religion, meaning those evidences which reside, not in the constitution of the universe, but in the constitution of human nature itself. Man must be shown to be a religious being before it is possible to consider which religion among many is true. The belief in God is the basis of Christianity; for if there be no God there can be no revelation of God; and it is because Dr. Martineau has done so much to persuade a critical and scientific age of its affinity to God, that I feel the greatness of the debt which is owing from all religious, and not least from all Christian thinkers, to his cultured and enlightened spirituality.

Dr. Welldon then spoke of the singular beauty of Dr. Martineau's sermons, as showing him at his best, "in his wonderful union of intellectuality and spirituality, in his passion for knowledge, in his yet deeper and holier passion for the life eternal."

He called himself a Unitarian, and he was for more than half a century the most conspicuous figure of English Unitarianism. Yet Unitarianism is a name, and one must ever be on one's guard against names. It needs, like other names, to be considered in its history; it must not be taken to mean always and everywhere the same thing.

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

There is a Unitarianism which is little more than the pale form of Deism; but there is another form of Unitarianism which is enkindled and illumined with all but the glow and lustre and beauty of the orthodox Christian faith. Such was the Unitarianism of Dr. Channing in the New World, and such was Dr. Martineau's in the Old World. He was, if I may so say, more Christian than his theology, as so many of us, alas! are less Christian than ours. It is with peculiar pleasure that I recall now a visit which he paid me not many years ago at Harrow. He attended Divine Service in the School Chapel; I think it was a happiness to him to join in prayer with the young and generous souls who worshipped there. And afterwards, when we were talking in my study, he made a remark to me which I have often felt to be luminous; he said that, Unitarian though he was, yet when he surveyed the course of ecclesiastical history, he was glad it was the Athanasian and not the Arian view of our Lord's person which had won the day in Christendom. Such a man was even intellectually all but Christian; ethically and spiritually he was Christian indeed.

After the memorial resolution had been passed, it was furthered agreed that steps be taken to secure some permanent memorial of Dr. Martineau.

At the meeting of the Council of the Liberation Society next Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Alfred Thomas, M.P., is to preside, and among the speakers are to be Dr. Guinness Rogers, Rev. Morgan Gibbon, Rev. Tolefree Parr, and Mr. Grosvenor Lee. At the City Temple meeting at night, Mr. Compton Rickett, M.P. (chairman), Mr. Birrell, M.P., Rev. P. T. Forsyth, D.D., Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., and Rev. Silvester Horne, M.A., are announced to speak. The Committee of the Society have carefully considered the provisions of the Government Burial Grounds Bill, which is down for second reading on Monday next, and have resolved to give it their support.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE CONFERENCE.

IX.

Mr. Hargrove's sermon and Mr. Wood's ten minutes' address impressed me as the most characteristic utterances of our Leicester Conference, and the most important from a denominational point of view. Not that I wish to bring the two into comparison, for, indeed, the note each struck sounded as differently in each as is the difference in the two human instruments through which it rang. Neither do I forget the many other valuable contributions to the three-days' life of our brotherhood—the delicately but warmly coloured portrait of our late master, Martineau, by our friend and big brother, Stopford Brooke; the artistic skill with which Mrs. Ward presented her subject; my father's contribution to the problem of conscience and the spirit's growth; Mr. Jacks' paper and the discussion that followed; Mr. Ellis's and Mr. Worthington's practical suggestions, &c. But all these were of interest and value in varying degree to other religionist's beyond our little community. The deep note of Mr. Hargrove's sermon—echoed, as I think, in Mr. Wood's characteristically different utterance—was the lesson and the gospel for us as Unitarians (or what you will).

If I monopolise the space allowed me for a brief summary of the impressions I got from Mr. Hargrove's discourse, it is because it seems to have been so little noticed in the previous "Impressions," and also because of the very great importance for us, which I am compelled to attach to it.

The key-note as I thought was that as a true "member" of the "body" of the Church we cannot be denied the exercise of our organic function, even though we remain unrecognised. "The eye cannot say to the hand I have no need of thee," and "If the foot shall say Because I am not the hand I am not of the body; it is not therefore not of the body." And so if Rome and Canterbury and the rest of Christendom say to us, Because ye are not of us ye are not of the body—we are not therefore not of the body.

But it was when Mr. Hargrove began to describe what our supreme function was, and showed how it united us organically with the great body, that he seemed to me to rise to a spiritual region the sense of which will never leave those who followed after him on that memorable night. Sympathy is so subtle a thing, so narrowly missed and yet so absolutely essential to anyone who would appreciate a man at his very best, that I, perhaps, have no right to expect everyone to be equally impressed. And yet as a very humble disciple I cannot curb the desire to reiterate in my own language some of the thoughts suggested by Mr. Hargrove's profound words. What is our function in the Church? What is our own supreme life? For the natural and perfect life of an organ is its function. If we do our work we shall thereby and at the same time realise our own perfect life. Is not ours the highest function of all? For our very negations throw us with unique emphasis upon the universal affirmation, "We believe in God." Our expressions of this are all diverse, for in striving towards God each can only reach his own highest, and this falls yet infinitely short of the Truth. But the higher we reach, the warmer, keener, more joyous will our vision become, for thought and joy and pulsing human love, finite as they must be to us, are yet the highest we can experience, and, therefore, the nearest to Him, though so far short of the Truth. To draw towards and to dwell upon this Truth—neglected and bedimmed among men as it is—to live and pray in vital touch, not with definitions of God, but with the living God Himself, is to enjoy a communion which no power can deny us. To use Mr. Hargrove's own beautiful words: "Souls praying truly are moving towards the same centre, even though they come from far different points of the great circumference, and seem to be tending in opposite directions. This is the true communion of saints." Joseph H. Wicksteed.

The belatedness of my response to your invitation has this advantage, that it relieves me of the need to say something which has already been well said. With nearly every expression of praise I agree. It is hard to refrain from filling a column with laudatory epithets. If any criticism is due it must fall upon the arrangements of the Conference Committee, who have doubtless by this time discovered, in the only possible way, the flaws in their programme. Leicester's part in the work was admirably done: a quiet, gracious, thoughtful completeness marked the hospitality with which she greeted us. The readers of papers had a high standard of expectation to attain, and all surpassed it. Even Mr. Stopford Brooke and Mr. Wicksteed, each in his own way, surpassed expectation. Those whose papers were to open a discussion were, of course, too long. Such papers always are too long, and I cannot see why they should be admitted into the progamme. Could we not have subjects for discussion, rather than papers? And could not the closure-rule be of impartial application? In those rare cases where it seemed advisable we could trust the Chairman's watch to behave with discretion. The only serious fault in this Conference was that it was not a Conference. We did not confer; we attended lectures. A similar criticism applies to the Business Meeting. It was impossible to consider so long an agenda sheet in so short a time. The Chairman's duty was clearly to gag debate, and he performed it to the applause of all men. We knew that the only way to arrive at any end was to vote the resolutions which stood on the paper. One note, and only one, in the whole symphony jarred on my ears. I wonder if I am quite singular in disliking that an advertisement of a new public school should be announced in the Guide Book as a paper on "The Future Supply of our Ministers."

The most important paper seems to me, as I look back, to have been that of Mr. Ellis on the "Development of Religious Life among the Young." The note of what Mr. Ellis read to us, "association," with the chord of Mr. Byles' comment, "personality, sincerity, service," may sound in our ears to such good purpose that we solve the greatest practical question which the individual minister has to face. This was for the active worker. For the more passive occupant of the pew, whose simply duty it is to persist in occupying the same, what could be better than Miss Clephan's short paper, which followed the thoughtful and sonorous periods of Mr. Jacks?

One detail more: the singing was wonderful. We might almost have been Welshmen. After all dues have been paid to organist and choir, there remains something to explain in this sudden psalmody. It is such a change from our normal ways! At least it will shatter for ever the prevalent suspicion that Unitarianism impairs the glottis. Evidently it is enthusiasm that sings, and as the influence of this triennial feast of devotion, thought and brotherhood spreads among our churches, an ever grander wave of inspiring sound will flood their roofs.

Would it were annual!

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

The Criticism of the Old Testament.

I.

First Period—from about 1800 to about 1830.
Eichhorn. De Wette. Gesenius.

In his sixty-fifth year Goethe took refuge from the troubles of Europe in the study of Oriental literature. The result was a little volume of lyric poems entitled "Der westöstliche Divan." The name was happily chosen, for the verses are eastern in imagery, western and, indeed, German in their real spirit. They exercised a wide influence on the literature of the time, setting a fashion which distinguished men were for the time glad to follow. It is, however, more to our present purpose that Goethe accompanied his verses with notes on the history and style of Oriental poetry, and that he mentions at some length and with evident enthusiasm the literature of the Hebrews. Moreover (and this is still more to the point), he mentions two teachers in this line of study who had placed him under special obligation. These were Herder and Eichhorn. Of Herder's "Spirit of Hebrew Poetry," which was published in 1782 and 1783, there is no occasion to say much. It had a great vogue in its day and, no doubt, did valuable service by opening men's eyes to the vivid simplicity and directness of the Hebrew poets, by teaching them to regard the Hebrew Bible as the expression of a national life which the student must learn to assimilate, if he would really understand the literature which it produced. Herder represents the romantic return to Nature, the preference for Homer and, strange as it may appear, for Ossian,* to the false and artificial classicalism of the French and the German imitators of the French. Herder's book is very long, very diffuse, and most persons at the present day who try to read it through will, we believe, find it intolerably tiresome. Eichhorn, as it seems to us, stands on a far higher level. Like Herder, he was a personal friend of Goethe, and Goethe's words describe Eichhorn so well, that it will be worth while to give them as they stand:—

> All along I had been Eichhorn's silent disciple. But I rejoiced to receive from his own hands that important work in which he sets before us the prophets and their environment. What can be more delightful, be it for the soberminded and reflective man, be it for the enthusiastic poet, than to behold these prophets gifted with sublime genius, as they stand before their own stormy times, point to its weird and threatening aspect, rebuke and warn, comfort and encourage the men of their day.

Here we find the critical, as distinct from the merely dogmatic and a priori view of prophecy defined with admirable clearness. Criticism is instructed common sense. It is therefore uncritical, because contrary to common sense and to the phenomena revealed by a careful study of their extant writings, to consider the prophets as men who wrote for future ages, as if their writings stood out of all real connection with the times in which they lived and the men to whom they actually addressed themselves. On the other hand, it is critical, because consistent with due reverence for fact, to investigate first of all the time or circumstances in which a document was written, to consider how the words would be understood by those who read or heard them in the first instance, and to require clear signs that the writer or speaker has in particular cases passed beyond his own time and is looking into the future. Now it is the great merit of Eichhorn that he took this critical view, and it is no mere accident that the very name "higher criticism" is due to him. By this he understood investigations which determine the authenticity, age, historical worth of an ancient writing as distinct from the mere comparison of manuscripts and versions for the purpose of ascertaining the correct text, this latter being the function of the "lower" or textual criticism. In the higher criticism, Eichhorn holds the first rank as a pioneer. But in reality he is much more than a pioneer. His "Introduction to the Old Testament" is, so far as we know, the first attempt to give a complete and connected view of old Hebrew literature from the critical and historical standpoint. It first saw the light in 1780, and appeared in three volumes. Eichhorn lived to issue a final edition, nominally the fourth, really the sixth, in 1823. It had by that time grown to five volumes. Despite inevitable opposition from the more conservative side, it had obtained universal recognition and wide acceptance in Germany. In very large measure the results which Eichhorn reached are valid at this day. It is interesting and also humiliating to observe that he states and proves facts which were scarcely known to the English public till the appearance of the once famous "Essays and Reviews" in 1860.

The reader may naturally wish to learn something of Eichhorn's life. It was an uneventful one, and we must content ourselves here with the bare record of a few facts. Eichhorn was born in 1752, and devoted himself in early life to the profound study of the classical, but more especially of the Semitic, languages. In 1775 he became professor at Jena, and was transferred three years later to a chair at Göttingen. Here he remained till his death in 1827. He was a man of kindly disposition and of adamantine industry. He used to lecture at least twenty-seven hours a week. He wrote on a great variety of subjects, chiefly on the Bible and on Semitic philology, but also on the literature and history of modern Europe. On these last his works had no permanent value; but it should be remembered that he introduced a new epoch in the criticism of the Synoptic Gospels.

What, then, were Eichhorn's contributions to the knowledge of the Old Testament? When we look into the fourth volume, which deals with the prophets, we find it difficult to believe that we are reading dissertations which carry us back more than a hundred years. Contrast, for example, Eichhorn's account of the prophecies attributed to Isaiah with the article on the same subject which appeared in Smith's "Bible Dictionary" so late as 1863. The author of the article is unable to free himself from the imposing authority of tradition; he counts his witnesses instead of weighing the value of the evidence they bear. Eichhorn's method is wholly different. He lived in a land where freedom of investigation had come slowly, but when it did appear, asserted itself in its fulness. The Rationalistic school had treated the Old Testament without historical sympathy or insight, but it had at least left a better way open for those who had the courage to take it. Eichhorn was by no means deficient in appreciation of the noble qualities in the Hebrew literature; but his was the true reverence which looks facts in the face, and has confidence in the truth. He appeals from that which has been said by Jews and Christians for two thousand years on Isaiah xl.-lxvi.* to that which these chapters say, indirectly of course, but still clearly and conclusively, about themselves. The unknown author, Eichhorn insists, speaks habitually as if he lived in the Babylonish exile, as if he had the Jewish exiles for his audience. In a number of minute points, he lets us see that he has the scenery of the exile around him. He never predicts the exile, as an author of Isaiah's time must of course have done had he referred to it at all. Far from it, he assumes throughout that the exile is an accomplished fact, and comforts his dejected brethren with the hope of a glorious restoration to Judah. Why should we refuse, Eichhorn asks, to take these "noble oracles" at their word and charge the real Isaiah with the folly of comforting his countrymen for a calamity which was not to occur for, say, a century and a-half after they were dead and gone, and which they could not possibly anticipate? Eichhorn clinches his case by careful examination of the differences in language and style between the earlier and later oracles. He shows, moreover, that other sections in the Book of Isaiah, e.g., xxiv.—xxvii., xxxv.— are of much later date than the genuine work of the prophet, whereas xv., xvi. were, on the other hand, written long before Isaiah's time.† He concludes by showing with great plausibility the way in which that anthology of prophetic oracles, which now bears the great name of Isaiah, was gradually compiled. Eichhorn applies the same scientific method to the whole of the prophetic literature. It is true that he scarcely appreciated the lofty and beautiful purpose discernible in the Book of Jonah, and that he failed to see the unity of the Book of Daniel as it stands before us in the Hebrew and Aramaic text. Still he clearly perceived that the visions in Daniel could not have been written before the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. He was also aware that the Hebrew of the Book of Jonah is of a comparatively late character, that the author speaks of Nineveh as a city which had ceased to exist, that the hymn ascribed to Jonah in the maw of the sea monster is deficient in originality and is little better than a cento of passages from the Psalter.

Nor is it only in dealing with the prophetic writings that Eichhorn inaugurates modern criticism. He pointed out that Ecclesiastes belongs to those sad times subsequent on the fall of the Hebrew monarchy, and that its language is in part akin to the Neohebraic which we find

* But see Palgrave's chapter on the Celtic Poets in his book on the poetical appreciation of Nature.

* Doubts on the authenticity of some of the prophecies attributed in our Hebrew Bibles to Isaiah were first expressed by Koppe in his German translation of Bishop Lowth's noble work on Hebrew Poetry. It should be added that Eichhorn regards Isaiah xl.-lxvi. as a number of independent fragments.

† This belief in the early date of Chapters xv., xvi. 1—12 prevailed generally among scholars down to our own time. Now, however, a very different view is supported by Schwally, Duhm, and others.

in the Mishna. And two points may be mentioned in which Eichhorn's judgment has been long ignored and has at last obtained recognition. The fact that Zechariah ix.—xiv., did not proceed from the same hand which wrote the earlier chapters has long been recognised. It is, however, but a few years ago that Wellhausen and others returned to Eichhorn's opinion that the concluding chapters instead of being earlier are decidedly later than the first chapters of the book. The chief argument for this is precisely that which Eichhorn gave long ago—namely, the mention of the Greeks. Again, Eichhorn utterly rejects the theory that the "Song of Songs" is in any sense a drama, and he urges with great force that dramatic (like epic) art was unknown to Semitic nations. What waste of time might have been saved, if scholars during the course of the century had taken Eichhorn's remarks to heart! Now, however, we may hope that we have seen the last of attempts to turn this collection of love songs into a play, and that we are done with those adventures of the shepherd and his bride, which are the baseless fiction of modern interpreters.

If then Eichhorn had advanced so far, what work was left for his successors? The answer is that Eichhorn knew nothing about the origins of religious and political life in Israel. Long before he began to learn and teach, a French physician, Astruc, had laid the firm foundations of Pentateuchal criticism by demonstrating the composite origin of Genesis. Eichhorn himself toiled with good success in this field and exhibited the linguistic peculiarities of the documents used, as he thought, by Moses. He shrunk from the further step of attributing any considerable portions of the Pentateuch to post-Mosaic authorship. Hence all his criticism is to some extent defective. He does not even rate the originality of the prophets at its real value. He has no means of estimating the religious position of David and therefore does not see any impossibility in ascribing to him half of the Psalter, though he is very sceptical about the correctness of the inscriptions prefixed in particular Psalms. However, he maintains with absolute confidence the Mosaic authorship of the Ninetieth Psalm, and accepts without hesitation the picture of David and his time left us by the Chronicler. Th ereader does not need to be told what a gulf is fixed between the position held on this matter by Eichhorn and that occupied even by the most conservative critics at the present day.

Meanwhile, in the early part of the century the method of critical inquiry was being applied to the Pentateuch and, in general, to the whole history of Israel. The investigation was long and difficult; it would be impossible within the limits at our command, nor is it necessary, to repeat at length facts which are familiar to all students of Old Testament criticism. By far the best representative of the freer handling of Old Testament historical books is De Wette. The life of this remarkable man extends from 1780 to 1849; he was theological professor at Heidelberg and then at Berlin; he was famous for his writings on the New Testament no less than for those on the Hebrew Bible; in many ways he wielded a religious influence which went far and struck deep. He held for a long time the theory then current in Germany that four of the five books of Moses consist of fragments,* mostly post-Mosaic. This theory, despite the element of truth which it contains, has long since been exploded, but De Wette's services are not likely to be forgotten by those who feel an intelligent interest in the history of Israel. In his "Contributions to the Study of the Old Testament" (two small volumes, 1806 and 1807), he settled permanently two questions, and thereby shook to its very centre the popular view of Hebrew history. First, he made a careful comparison of the narrative in the books Samuel and Kings on the one hand, in Chronicles on the other. He shows that the Chronicler adds and subtracts, not because he has access to new facts, not merely because he is interested in special aspects of the history, but because he constructs a history out of his own imagination in accordance with the religious ideas of his own time. De Wette points out the chronicler's appetite for marvels, his love for Judah, and passionate hatred of the Northern Kingdom which he regarded as schismatic—his "Levitismus," as De Wette calls it, i.e., his inability to place himself outside of the Levitical law to which he was devoted heart and soul. He assumes that this Levitical law was known and acknowledged as divine from the days of Moses, and explains divergent usage too notorious to be passed over as conscious lapse into idolatry or schism. Yet, as De Wette proves from Samuel and Kings, essential features of this law were utterly unknown under the earlier Kings. The law was neither kept or broken, for it did not exist. In the next place De Wette employs a cumulative argument to fix the date of Deuteronomy. Deuteronomy, he says, denounces repeatedly (iv. 19; xvii. 3) the worship of sun, moon and stars, but it is under Manasseh (2 Kings xxi. 5; xxiii. 5) that this worship first appears, and Jeremiah (viii. 2) denounces it, just as the Deuteronomist does. This indication of late origin is confirmed by the reflection in Deuteronomy on the nature of prophecy (xiii. 1; xviii. 20 seq.), and still more by law of the Kingdom, which can scarcely have been written except by one who had fallen on evil days, who looked back on the history of the kingly power in the past, and was disappointed with its results. De Wette turns this probability into certainty by fixing attention on the great characteristic of Deuteronomy—namely, its insistence that all sacrifice should be offered nowhere save at the one place which Jehovah chose out of all the tribes. Evidently the most pious Kings and great prophets (e.g. Elijah), offered sacrifice at various places with perfect freedom. Hezekiah was the first to attack the worship on the high places. "Nay, only under Josiah were all the requirements of Deuteronomy fulfilled; then first the Passover was kept according to law, as a national feast (2 Kings xxiii. 22). Under Josiah the law was found, and everything points to the conclusion that Deuteronomy was then [first] introduced." Such are De Wette's words, and on this sure result the criticism of the Mosaic law has been rested ever since. The date of Deuteronomy is approximately fixed; the remainder of the Hexateuch falls into its place as prior or subsequent to Deuteronomy.

De Wette's commentary on the Psalms first came before the public in 1811, and a sentence or two taken from the first edition will help the reader to see that here also De Wette broke new ground in Old Testament criticism. After showing that the titles of the Psalms cannot be trusted, and that they attribute to David Psalms which are post-exilic, he continues thus:—

> To me, in accordance with my critical principles, the very existence of Davidic Psalms has become problematical. It is not enough that character and contents do not contradict the title; we need grounds of positive probability to outweigh the suspicion which rests on the titles. The monotony of the so-called Davidic Psalms is an argument against their Davidic authorship. Many of the plaintive Psalms are in the same tone, express the same ideas, presuppose the same situation. A poet who could write the elegy on Saul and Jonathan would not repeat himself in this way. If there are Maccabean Psalms, and this is the opinion held by some of the best commentators, the collection cannot have been closed till the end of the Maccabean period. This would agree very well with all that we know about the history of the canon, for that probably was only closed after the time of Antiochus Epiphanes.*

To the great names of Eichhorn and De Wette we must add a third, that of Gesenius, who was born in 1786, and died in 1842. As a scholar he was by far the greatest of the three; but his fame rests not so much on historical criticism as upon his services to Hebrew lexicography and grammar, as also on that mine of Oriental learning, his commentary on Isaiah (1821). But his position is always thoroughly critical. In his interesting "History of the Hebrew Language" (1815) he accepts De Wette's conclusion as to the date of Deuteronomy, distinguishes, as he had already done in his commentary, the genuine from the post-exilic elements in the Book of Isaiah, and, although less sceptical than De Wette in his attitude to "Davidic" Psalms, he reminds his readers that he was the first "to show with some approach to completeness the late character of the Hebrew" in the Book of Job, which he assigns to the time of the exile.

We should be glad to name, if we could, men of mark in this period who still maintained the traditional views. But in the early part of the century the conservative school in Germany was exceedingly weak; in France and England critical attack and conservative defence were alike unknown. Probably the most notable advocate of traditional opinions on the Old Testament was Jahn (1750-1816), a Roman Catholic scholar, deeply versed in Oriental learning. His chief works—("Introductio in libros Vet. Foed. in compendium redacta, 1840"; "Archæologia Biblica in compendium redacta, 1804"; "Enchiridion Hermeneuticae Generalis Tabularum Veteris et Novi Foed., 1812"; "Appendix Hermeneutica, being an examination of the Messianic

* The theory was due to Geddes, a Scotch Roman Catholic clergyman, who published an annotated translation of the Pentateuch and Joshua in 1792; of Judges, Samuel, Kings and Chronicles in 1797; "Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures, Vol. i., containing remarks on the Pentateuch" in 1800. He was suspended a divinis by his bishop, and met with scant sympathy in England. But part of his work was translated by Vater, and his theory was widely accepted in Germany.

* Once more contrast Smith's Bible Dictionary in 1863, remembering that then it marked the high-water mark of O.T. scholarship. "The titles of the Psalms are, when rightly interpreted, fully trustworthy, and every separate objection that has been made to any one of them can be fairly met." Art. on "Book of Psalms" in Vol. ii.

Prophesies, 1813-1815")—were published by him in Latin versions; the book named last seems to have been originally written in Latin. For this reason Jahn was well known in England at a time when scarcely anyone read German. After all, he was not conservative enough for his fellow Catholics even in Germany, and he was moved from his chair in the University of Vienna, though rewarded at the same time with a canonry in the Cathedral Church of the same city. His "Introduction," "Hermenentica," and "Appendix" were all placed by the Roman authorities on the Index. W. Addis.

LITERATURE.

A DIVIDEND TO LABOUR.*

Mr. Gilman begins with the remark that the great Duke of Wellington once complained that he was "much exposed to authors." Similarly, the modern employer of Labour complains that he is much exposed to philanthropists who do not understand the conditions under which alone business can be carried on. Mrs. Carlyle said "Mixing things that differ is the Great Bad." Business is one thing, philanthropy is another. Moreover, "It is far more important for the workman that his employer shall be financially successful, than that he shall be kind and generous in his dealings. A hard employer who keeps his men steadily at work for years on the average wage is much more of a real benefactor to the operative than the genial employer whose inexperience or lack of capacity closes the factory in a few months." Political economy long ignored the function of the employer as distinct from the capitalist, but recently he has been sufficiently recognised.

The man who has the mental ability and the force of character requisite for the conduct of industry on a large scale under the trying conditions of modern competition, but who has not the large capital needed, is the man whom the capitalist proper seeks, and eagerly embraces when found. Here is the one magician who can call up profits from the nether deep by his potent art. The two functions of providing money and of furnishing the able brain and the masterful character are always to be distinguished whether in different persons or in the same person. When a man of innate executive power and great acquired knowledge has also become a capitalist through his deserved prosperity he unites the two functions. As a capitalist he lends money to himself as an employer, but the second function is far more rarely exercised prosperously among men than the first.

The successful employer on a large scale is a comparatively recent development in social life; and all new forms of human relationship are very slowly moralised. An original man makes a successful stroke in business, others follow his example, but it is a long time before the community generally pronounces a moral judgment on the new departure.

We have a ghastly illustration of this in connection with the English industrial revolution which, 100 years ago, changed the predominance in our industries from agriculture to manufacture. As in all revolutionary changes, the worst evils fell upon the weakest and most helpless class. Mr. Whateley Cooke-Taylor's admirable "History of the Modern Factory System" is here referred to for the facts, especially in connection with the apprenticeship of pauper children. The whole history is a striking illustration of the need there may be for legislative interference before the moral sense of the community is sufficiently developed to do without it, and also of the way in which this moral sense may be developed under wise legislation till it is ready to go much farther than legal requirements demand. To this farther stage the civilised world has already attained in a very large number of instances, and Mr. Gilman's book is a valuable record of what has been accomplished. He says, p. 13:—

Surely it is a great, if not commanding, influence which the large mill-owner, for instance, exercises over his work-people. They have come by hundreds from all quarters to do the work and take the wages that he had offered. A community is gathered and a new town, perhaps, is formed. Year after year, to these hundreds, or even thousands, of workers, their work is the most important life-matter, as it is the foundation of all other matters. That the man who controls the supply of this work, who has owned, or still owns, the ground his employés tread upon, and the houses in which they dwell—that this man has no moral relations toward them beyond paying wages and collecting rents, that he is not called upon to exercise the potent and far-reaching influence upon their present and their future which he might by taking a warm interest in them as human beings capable of education and progress—this is a position betraying a curiously incomprehensive idea of human duty. To an instructed and impartial mind it will seem the most glaring instance, perhaps, afforded by the modern world of the survival of tribal morals (employers being regarded as one tribe and workmen as another), and of the superficiality of the Christian veneer over a too substantial selfishness.

Chapter II. is called "A Realisable Ideal," and exhibits the principles on which a large number of successful employers have acted and are acting in their relations with their workpeople, giving them either a direct share in the profits, or else giving them what Mr. Gilman calls an indirect dividend. Chapter III. tells the story of Robert Owen, the manufacturer, showing what a splendid example he set at New Lanark as far back as 1799, and how, before 1829, when he retired from business, he had anticipated almost all the beneficial changes which have since been slowly spreading elsewhere.

With Chapter IV. begins Part 2 of the book, which consists of an elaborate record of advantages given by employers to their workpeople in addition to their ordinary wages. This constitutes what is called the Indirect Dividend to Labour. Mr. Gilman describes Welfare-Institutions in Germany, Patronal Institutions in France, Patronage in Holland and Belgium, British Employers' Institutions, and American Liberality to Workmen. Of course the list is not exhaustive—in the case of England it is very far from being so—but it is a fine record of what has already been proved practical, and may be cordially recommended to all who desire information on the subject. Part 3 treats of "A Direct Dividend to Labour," and describes five typical cases of profit-sharing, the English example being the South Metropolitan Gas Company. Ten years ago Mr. Gilman published a valuable book on profit-sharing, and he now adds information bringing his account of it up to date. But his record of the Indirect Dividend is far more hopeful, especially in America where the wealthy employer has been most generous in his benefactions to the localities where his fortune has been made. Generally speaking, too, there is now ample recognition of the fact that the status of the human beings employed is a most important element in the manufactory, and that physical vigour, intelligence, sobriety, and good conduct are as essential for success as the latest machinery or efficient transport. In the last resort, we reach what St. Paul told us a good while ago.

> In the deep consciousness of a common life, the full recognition of a common aim, and the just division of a common product, the industrial members work together as one body, head and heart and hand agreeing in one conspiracy of benefit. Great even now is their reward who aspire and co-operate towards such fraternity, inspired by an unfailing enthusiasm for humanity.

"FREE SPEECH."*

In his address on "Free Speech," to which attention has already been drawn in these columns by the letter from the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Mr. Thomas attempts to define the duty of a minister in his pulpit in regard to the great questions of the day. One view of the minister's duty is thus described:—

> He may recognise that the Church is a corporate body of members uniting together for fellowship and growth in the Christian life and mind. He may then confine himself to the work of simply stimulating that life and mind, and enunciating broad spiritual and moral principles, and leave the congregation to apply those principles in their private and public life. This is indeed what many of our wisest and most revered teachers tell us. "Declare the moral Ideal," they urge. "Reveal the King in his beauty, but do not touch upon matters on which the deliverances of the various consciences of men differ and conflict." The work of the pulpit, according to this theory, is not to pronounce on practical or social morality, but rather to strip the veil from the heart, to illuminate the soul with a flood of spiritual light, to regenerate the inward life, to quicken the affections and rekindle the paling aspirations of men into an intenser glow. This is indeed the great, and, I will say, the primary work of any man who professes to carry on the spirit and work of the Master. But is it the only work? Is he to be silent—must he stand as a voiceless prophet in the face of the actual sins and struggles of mankind? Has he nothing to say about great humanitarian questions—matters of social and National honour? Is it his work simply to declare with infinite variations of beauty and of force, "Be good, follow Christ, love man, fear the Lord."

This view does not satisfy Mr. Thomas; if generally adopted, it would, in his view, greatly enfeeble the usefulness of the pulpit. In the ancient prophets he finds a better ideal of what preaching ought to be. They certainly dealt with the political questions of the hour, and with concrete questions of practical morals.

> These sturdy old prophets of Israel did not have an easy time of it. Kings and governments silenced them; popular excitement, the delirium and insanity of majorities stoned and persecuted them. Even the "sweet reasonableness" of Christ cried "Woe unto to you, for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and garnish the tombs of the righteous and say: If we had been in the days of our fathers, we should not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore ye witness to yourselves that ye are sons of them that slew the prophets." The prophets died murdered by the popular mob; Christ was crucified by the official government; Stephen martyred by Jewish orthodoxy. Should these have confined themselves to "broad moral and spiritual principles"? Should they have recognised that there is a time and place for everything, and that they must not expect too much of human nature? Read the Epistle of James, or those of Paul, and you will find matters of practical social and private life come out almost in every other verse. Come down to the great preachers—the Wycliffes, the Savonarolas, the Luthers—and you will find something more palpable and concrete—aye, and something more terribly stern than abstract "moral and spiritual principles." Was John Woolman wrong in applying spiritual Christianity to the question of slavery, and in making his brethren among the Society of Friends bitterly uncomfortable in the possession of slaves? Are Theodore Parker and Channing to be condemned for having come down from that beautiful translunary world of moral and spiritual ideals to the facts of slavery and war about their very feet?

* An Address delivered in the Memorial Church, Liscard, by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. The Liverpool Booksellers Co., 70, Lord-street. 3d.

These passages are sufficient to show the quality of Mr. Thomas's address, and the position that he takes up. We will only further urge our readers to procure the address and to read the whole of it for themselves.

WOOD-NOTES WILD.*

The lover of things lovely cannot fail to be delighted with this booklet, printed in beautiful type on Dickinson's hand-made paper, and clothed in a dainty wrapper. Mr. Harrold Johnson is to be heartily congratulated on the publication of his first venture in poetry. As the title-page more than hints, we have here a carefully selected sheaf from the harvested produce of 1889-1900. There are altogether twenty-four poems, all of different metre, all well worth publishing, but, as might be expected, not all of equal merit. The first poem is on the "Eternal Quest of the Ideal," beginning:—

> Will you seek the Holy Grail,
> Brother knight, along with me?
> You shall suffer, you may fail,
> Doubt, despair your lot may be,
> Brother, will you go with me?

The last is an expression of subdued and peaceful triumph, entitled "Transfiguration."

> A life within this life, a world unseen
> Floats softly by me soothing my unrest,
> And mystic voices pass the void between,
> And call me to the Islands of the Blest.
> I pass. Transfigured in the realms of love
> I am at one with Him who reigneth there,
> My raiment gloweth white as snow, I move
> In harmony with all the good and fair.

The poems are divided with evident design into four parts, one on Nature, three on Man, and it is difficult to choose where there is much that rings true to the supreme tests of Beauty, Truth, and Passion. Every reader will have his personal preferences, so one need not hesitate to hazard his own. Of those in lighter vein, "A May Wish," "A Christmas Poem," "By the Sea," and "The One Thing Needful," cannot fail to captivate and charm.

Of the sonnets, that "To a Rich Landowner," strikes a strong chord of true artistic power. Of this the following are the first eight lines:—

> Who clothes the hills in splendour of dark wood
> And purple heather and vast hoary steeps?
> Who pours the torrent down the craggy deeps
> And rounds huge boulders with the whirling flood?
> He who creates, and finds that all is good—
> And who made man to lord it, that he keeps
> With greedy hands and guilt of hoarded heaps
> The common treasures of God's Fatherhood?

The prevailing tone of the volume is that of robust struggle and healthy exultation. Other poems that at once arrest the reader are: "The Hope of the World,"—on the impressive theme of Evolution, and "The Mountain Pine"—an expression of genuine imaginative power. And finally, we will quote one other poem in full, entitled "Creation":—

> Deep down the fathomless ages the Master painted a picture,
> Ages and ages changing, ages and ages the same,
> Simple and perfect He wrought it, toilless, alone and unwearied,
> Master and picture are one.
> Years followed years, and the artists copied the work of the Master, > Humbly, with reverence following, toiled, and suffered, and bled,
> Caught some faint gleams of the light after intricate, tortuous mazes,
> Flushed with the triumph and died.
> Artists, the Master who wrought you put His own being within you,
> Ye are divine and Creators; feel ye this, then shall ye paint
> Toilless, alone, and unwearied, a picture, simple and perfect—
> Artist and picture are one.

ESSEX HALL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION ANNUAL MEETING.

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me to inform your readers that the annual meeting of the above Association will be held at Essex Hall on Friday evening, June 8, when, among other important matters, a proposed alteration in the title of the Association will be discussed, it having been found that the present title has given rise to misconception, especially on the part of country friends.

The following are among the titles already suggested, and I shall be glad to have the views of members and friends to lay before the Committee at their next meeting on May 10:—

"The Unitarian Temperance Association."

"The Free Christian Temperance Association."

"Unitarian, Free Christian and Allied Churches Temperance Association."

OBITUARY.

MISS ANNE V. LISTER.

Many of our readers, especially in London, will be grieved and shocked to read the announcement of the death of Miss Lister, which occurred, on Good Friday, at Assouan, Upper Egypt. The Lister family has for generations held an honoured placed in our churches, and Mr. Isaac Solly Lister and his two sisters, who have lived together at Upper Heath, Hampstead, attached members of Rosslyn-hill Chapel, have been identified with many good causes, helping by their work and their means, and by the hospitality of their Hampstead home. Fresh in the memory of our readers will be the generosity with which they opened their grounds to the performance of the masque of Comus for the Building Fund of our London churches. The elder sister was especially interested and active in the neighbouring Hospital for Consumption. But the work by which she will be best remembered is that of Rosslyn-hill day-schools. For thirty years she had been an active member of the Committee, and for much of that time she had been their untiring friend, counsellor, and practical manager. Familiar with all the details of their work, she had seen the need of handing them over to the London School Board; her last cares before leaving home for this journey had been given to the details of the transfer, and a few weeks ago, in her absence, she had been nominated by the Board one of the group of "Managers" who were to have the new Hampstead schools in their charge. Alas! before she could enter on the work, she had passed away. At the beginning of the year a voyage to Egypt was recommended for Mr. Lister, who was recovering slowly from a severe illness of last year, and it was arranged for the sisters to accompany their brother. For a time all went well, but at Assouan, a month ago, she was seized with an attack of influenza. After some weeks, strong feverish symptoms, accompanied by feeble action of the heart, developed themselves, and on the 13th inst., without pain, she passed away.

THE LATE JOHN WRIGHT.

The obituary notice of this excellent man, which appeared in The Inquirer, recalls the days when he was a burning and a shining light of Lancashire Unitarianism. Full as that notice was of his manifold labours, yet it must necessarily leave much unsaid that testifies what a force he was, and that endeared him to the vast majority of those who were brought into personal contact with him. As an old pupil of his, and a near neighbour for a number of years, I should be glad to be allowed to bear my testimony to his many good qualities, and to the esteem and love in which he was held. It was my great privilege to enjoy his friendship, and to have much personal intercourse with him, during the first years of my ministry. I was his nearest ministerial neighbour, and had charge of a congregation, of which he was the founder, for it was he that first broke ground at Heywood, preaching the first sermon there in 1856. It was also the first fruits of that missionary spirit, in the fifties, which sent such a wave of enthusiasm over our churches, and which called into existence most, if not all, of our missionary organisations. I may here state that I once heard Mr. Wright say that it was the Heywood movement that first suggested the idea of the East Lancashire Mission, and of this organisation he was commonly designated the father.

It was a rare good fortune for any young man, just entering as I was upon the ministry, to come into close contact with a man like Mr. Wright, and the memory of our happy relations with each other is to me a most precious possession. I could go to him as to a father in any little difficulties or troubles that arose, and always found in him a most sympathetic friend and adviser. During his summer vacations it was his custom to ask me to supply his pulpit for as many Sundays as I wished. There was no aloofness about him, no stiffness or formality; nothing of the master, even to his pupils. He was ever the same genial open spirit; fond of a joke and a laugh, bright and humorous in his conversation, and had the art of at once setting the timorous and nervous at their ease. It was these qualities that made him so popular and beloved by the students of the Home Missionary Board. He won their confidence, and they could always look up to him with respect and love.

These same qualities, even more, perhaps, than his great ability and zeal, combined to make him one of the most popular ministers among our Lancashire churches. Not only by his own congregation, but by many elsewhere, he was greatly admired and loved, and no one was more welcome at school anniversaries, or at district meetings than he. Indeed, the latter without him would have been like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. Something of the spirit of his grandfather, the great Unitarian Missionary, Richard Wright, must have been in him, for he had the zeal of an apostle, and he was the life and soul of the missionary movement in East Lancashire during his ministry at Bury. He had a ready pen and tongue; he was an earnest and eloquent extempore preacher and platform speaker, and did not even shrink from public debate. I remember on one occasion a popular Nonconformist minister in Bury made an attack upon him for something he had said on some doctrinal point, and his reply was a challenge to a public debate on the subject "in any place and before any audience."

It was a sad drawback to his public usefulness that at a comparatively early age he became subject to attacks of gout, which often interfered with the discharge of his duties, and which cut short his ministry at Bury. I was frequently called upon, often at very short notice, when these attacks came on to fill his place, one of them being the occasion of the Sunday-school anniversary at Bury. It was a great loss to our body when he was thus compelled to relinquish, in mid-life, his pulpit at Bury and go to a quieter sphere of labour and a more genial climate. And probably this was the cause of his comparatively early retirement from the ministry altogether. Since then another generation has grown up that knows little or nothing about him, and to whom at best he can only be a name. His retirement was complete, for seldom has he appeared before the public, either by voice or pen, since then. He has now passed beyond the veil, the last of a noble band of ministers whose portraits are now before me; I mean the old Manchester ministers, commonly known as the Twelve Apostles. I have often thought them a remarkable set of men to be gathered together in the same district, to be formed into one society, and to be taken in one photographic group. The last link that bound these men to the present is now gone, and where shall we look for their like? In our body, at least, it would scarcely be possible to find a dozen ministers now, within a radius of a dozen miles, of like mental calibre and social standing. They deserve to be held in honoured remembrance by our churches, and not the least the one who was the last to depart. John Fox.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"A Bit of Good News."

And now I am going to tell you A Bit of Good News for Each of You.

One day a lot of lads were playing in the street. They were noisy, rough, and dirty. A finely-dressed young woman hurrying along, ran against a bare-footed lad, and upset him!

"I beg your pardon. Did it hurt you?" she said.

"No Miss," said he, as soon as he could speak, "and you may run agin me and knock me down twenty times if you want ter."

He was so pleased that she, so well-dressed, should apologise to him. It fairly took his breath away.

Have you never felt an inch taller and a week happier when someone whom you have greatly admired and looked up to has actually come and spoken to you? And would it not be a bit of good news to you if you were told that somebody of great power, and wisdom, and love would speak to you any day you liked?

A poor boy, without father and mother, who had to spend most of his days in the muddy streets, one day saved a beautiful little girl from being run over, but got run over himself. He was taken to the Hospital. The mother of the little girl was a lady. She went at once—she went every day and every night to see and help the dying boy in his little bed. She did all she could—she would have done anything—to save him. But soon his pain all went, and she saw that he was slowly passing away. And she said: "Teddie dear, is there anything at all I can do for you?"

He looked up at her beautiful face with his large bright eyes, he hardly dared to ask, it seemed so much—for she was a real lady—but at last he said:

"You couldn't—you couldn't—I s'pose, kiss me?"

Kiss him! Couldn't she? Didn't she?

May I tell you now my Bit of Good News for you? See! The King of Kings, the Lord of Lords, the greatest of all Beings,—God will speak to you. Yes, to you! Not in words as I do. God speaks in Things and Thoughts. You have heard Him yourself already. The boy Samuel, and the boy Jesus, heard him. And by the time a boy or a girl is ten years old you are able to understand when God speaks to you. How? Listen: A great man, named Emerson, often used to tell a story of something he once saw. It was about a little girl. The girl's mother was a wise good Quaker lady. Her name was Mary Rotch.

One day the little girl came into the room and asked if she might do a certain thing, which the mother knew was wrong. But instead of answering Yea or Nay, the mother said: "Well child, what does the voice in thee say?"

The child went away to be alone by herself, and, by and by, she came back and said: "Mother, the little voice says—No!" And that settled it.

"Ah that," said Emerson, "starts the tears to one's eyes!"

And why? Why just to think that the Infinite God would speak to the soul of that little girl, and just to think that she would listen and obey. You won't forget the three things, will you?

A Great Wonder:—God is Everywhere.
A Grand Secret:—God Always Knows.
A Bit of Good News:—
God Speaks to You.

Shall I tell you, to end with, something in poetry about myself? I daresay, perhaps, it may turn out to be something about yourself as well. But you will know when you hear it or read it. Why not learn the poem? Anyway, please to watch, very closely, and try to catch the meaning of what I am going to say:—

I saw the beauty of the world
Before me like a flag unfurled,
The splendour of the morning sky,
And all the stars in company;
I thought, How beautiful it is!
My soul said, "There is more than this."

I saw the pomps of death and birth,
The generations of the earth;
I looked on saints and heroes crowned,
And love as wide as heaven is round;
I thought, How wonderful it is!
My soul said, "There is more than this."

Sometimes I have an awful thought
That bids me do the thing I ought;
It comes like wind, it burns like flame,
How shall I give that thought a name?
It draws me like a loving kiss,—
My soul says, "There is more than this."

Yea, there is One I cannot see,
Yet feel that He is Lord to me;
And in the heavens and earth and skies,
In the good which lives till evil dies,
This Someone I can not withstand
Is God—God—God on every hand! *

WORK AND PLAY.

The Jubilee of the London District Unitarian Society, which falls in the present year, is to be signalised, as our readers are already well aware, by the raising of a fund of at least £12,000, two-thirds of which are to be the nucleus of a Permanent Chapel Building Fund, while the other third may be used to meet the needs of existing churches, to pay off charges on the buildings, or to secure freeholds. Such an effort to strengthen and extend the work of Unitarians in the cause of Liberal Christianity in the metropolitan area could not fail to secure very widespread and cordial support, and already by direct donations the Fund amounts to close upon £10,000. But in all such efforts, as treasurers know to their cost, it is the last thousand or two which are the most difficult to compass, and this is what has to be done in the present instance during the coming week.

Steady work has been going on, to this end, for eighteen months and more, preparing for the Bazaar, which is to be opened on May Day at the King's Hall. Many people do not love bazaars, and if the raising of the money were all, we should look with a good deal of repugnance upon such a climax to a serious effort. But there is much else to be remembered, and we may be heartily glad in the thought of the large amount of patient and unselfish work that has been put into this effort, the spirit of good-comradeship that has been generated in an ever-widening circle, and the drawing together of the bonds of unity in a common work, which, we may surely hope, will remain for effective service in coming years. It is by no means in London alone that these happy forces have been at work. The list of donations bears witness to the generous sympathy of many friends in different parts of the country; and at the Bazaar the Manchester stall, which already before the event has achieved a large result, will testify to the good-feeling between North and South, which had its earlier demonstration at the time of the Manchester Bazaar. From other parts of the country abundant help has flowed in. Wales will be represented by a stall of her own; and even from distant India our friends of the Brahmo Somaj have sent gifts which will have all the fascination of the Orient and the added grace of the friendliness which has prompted such an act.

But now it remains with our friends to make all this generous effort thoroughly effective for the purpose towards which it has been directed, and it should be done in the same happy spirit in which the work of preparation has been carried through. The three days of the Bazaar afford an opportunity, not only for the achievement of the financial end, which will be of such great benefit to the churches most directly concerned, but for a delightful gathering of friends which shall bring into one focus all the good-feeling which has inspired, and has been inspired by this effort, so that it may be thoroughly enjoyed. There is much business to be done, but it is to be done as pleasure, to secure its happiest result, and not without an underlying consciousness of the more serious purpose, which reaches much further than the mere getting of the money.

This Bazaar has been organised on right principles, for honest sale of goods, free from all objectionable practices, and whether one thinks a bazaar an ideal method of raising money or not, it has a social aspect with which all must sympathise. Therefore we would say to all our friends, Come, and let there be no doubt as to the abundant generosity that shall secure for the Bazaar the happiest issue.

Presentation Portrait of Dr. Blake Odgers.—We are requested by Mr. A. Savage Cooper, hon. sec. of the Portrait Committee, in connection with the London Bazaar, to say, in answer to several inquiries, that the presentation of the portrait of Dr. Odgers will be made at the conversazione on Saturday evening, May 5, in the King's Hall Rooms.

At the London Bazaar next week we understand that visitors will have an opportunity of giving expression to their sympathy with the men now serving in South Africa, to whom it is said that articles of comfortable clothing will be a very welcome gift. A khaki crate is to be placed in a central position in the Bazaar, in which any purchases intended for the Army may be deposited, when they will be at once forwarded to South Africa.

THE BAZAAR OF NEXT WEEK.

Essex Hall has been daily getting more and more blocked with parcels, crates, hampers, boxes, picture-cases, &c. At thirty, forty, fifty churches—probably many more, for it is difficult to say where the workers have not been busy—a similar if smaller convergence of goods has been seen. The London County Council will doubtless be rendered more than ever eager to relieve the traffic about Holborn when the final massing movement takes place, and all the produce of these many months of skilful industry—and in many cases of self-denying generosity—finds itself besieging the doors of the King's Hall, Newton-street.

That this convergence of goods—"good goods," as they have emphatically been called—will draw after it a dense stream of visitors, from London, from the debateable region vaguely known as "the suburbs," which may be made as inclusive as one pleases, and from all parts of the country clearly beyond the circle but within the attraction of the metropolis—this is the confident expectation of excellent judges. "Did not the London Triennial," they say, "bring together numbers far beyond any previous record? Is not this, too, the very time of all the year when London puts on its loveliest charm of green trees and flower-decked windows? And is not this unprecedented effort of the London Unitarians just the thing to add the compulsions of duty to the allurements of pleasure? When, if not now, will the faithful flock together, and by their united efforts render May, 1900, an epoch in the metropolitan annals of our movement?"

So these prophets shrewdly argue; and meanwhile there is already a great throng being organised and drilled, and rehearsed, to play their parts as sellers and stewards, and actors, and singers, and musicians, and exhibitors of rare and beautiful things. If the performers are so many, what must the audiences be! Happily the King's Hall, and suite of rooms—(their very names have an opulent sound: Crown Room, Throne Room, Duke's Room, and so on)—are large; and the diligent officers who have been operating upon the face of chaos so long will no doubt in due time make cosmos of it all in preparation for Tuesday, the opening day.

For, the long-looked-for day will come at last, and the long-worked-for success will be won. Success, undoubtedly, not alone the money success—though it is a big pull to raise a net profit of considerably over £2,000 by this Bazaar, and the visitors will do well to enjoy a season of really open-hearted and open-handed generosity on this occasion. But there is another success inside the cash business. It is the joy of feeling that we have no dying cause to work for. Look at these regiments of bright, active, intelligent young people who have been heartily glad to find in this work something they could take a hand in as well as their seniors. Look at these conferences and committees of representatives from different churches, knitting up the members into friendships not easy ever to break again. This extended capital of mutual knowledge and goodwill is no bad asset with which to start the twentieth century.

That is the kind of thought the serious-minded will be glad to cherish as the merry May-days—for merry as well as busy they will evidently be—go on. We must not here usurp the function of the Bazaar Book and the Daily Programme; but must content ourselves with saying that from half-past two, when Lady Brunner, Lady Durning-Lawrence, and Mrs. Frederick Nettlefold are in turn to open the Bazaar, on three successive days, till ten, when the doors will close, there will be entertainment enough for the most light-hearted, as well as purchasables enough for the heaviest purse. Scenes pastoral and (almost) tragic, "variety" sketches, dramatic pieces ranging from Jane Austen to Sheridan, science with its wireless telegraphy and "X-rays," art with its portraits drawn or painted on the spot (or modelled, if one prefers sculpture), music in many forms and at all hours—such is the ample fare provided in this kind. Indeed, it is so copious that it overflows; and the Brixton Choral Union, under skilful direction, and aided by special talent, boldly means to woo the public to a fourth evening's concert (on Friday) with the "Wedding of Hiawatha." After which, what could be more appropriate than that, with light hearts, their busy week over, the young people of all ages should hold a conversazione and dance on Saturday!

Well, there will be the three good busy days to work through before these supplementary joys are reached; and many a day afterwards in which to look back and, amid pleasant recollections and many pretty things added to our private stores, to consider well what we are to do with the money—and with the stores of fruitful energy—brought forth by the Bazaar.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

The Council met on Tuesday afternoon at Essex Hall, the President, Mr. Charles W. Jones, J.P., in the chair. There were also present Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Miss Burkitt, Mr. George Callow, Rev. George Carter, Mr. G. W. Chitty, Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Mr. Richard Eve, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Rev. H. Gow, B.A., Mr. Charles Harding, Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Major Haynes, Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford, Mr. W. C. Jolly, J.P., Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, Rev. H. Woods Perris, Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, Mr. J. T. Preston, Miss E. Sharpe, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Mr. John Sudbery, Miss Tayler, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Miss Teschemacher, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., who acted for the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the secretary, in his absence in America.

The minutes of the preceding meeting were read and confirmed.

Mr. Tarrant then read the report, as follows:—

Report.

Since the last meeting of the Council held in October, the Executive Committee have met six times, and there have been twenty-six meetings of the various sub-committees.

Finance.—The following is a summary of the ordinary income from Jan. 1 to March 31, 1900:—Subscriptions, £851 2s. 6d.; donations and collections, £80 9s. 4d.; dividends and rent, &c., £376 13s. 11d.; book-room sales, £344 6s. 2d.; legacies, &c., £175; making, with the balance of £23 11s. 2d. from 1899, the sum of £1,751 8s. 1d. The expenditure for the same period in grants to congregations, bookroom, offices and other expenses has been £1,085 9s. 4d. In June and September a large sum will be required for grants, and the subscriptions will not be in the same proportion, as most of them are paid at the beginning of the year. The Council will be pleased to know that from 183 congregations the amount of £549 11s. 7d. has been received from congregational collections during 1899. An anonymous donation of £250 has been received. The Committee have pleasure in reporting that legacies have been received from the late Mr. Thomas Young £50, Mrs. Caroline Janson £50, Mr. John Harrop £75, and Mr. Charles Wragg £50.

Publications.—During the three months ending March 31, 1,237 books, 20,623 pamphlets, valued at £124 1s. 11d., have been granted to churches, postal missions, and individual correspondents. The "Pocket Almanac" and the "Essex Hall Year Book" for 1900 have been published, and copies of the latter have been sent to all subscribers of 10s. and upwards to the funds of the Association. A new edition of the volume of Sermons entitled "Spiritual Perspective," by the late Rev. C. J. Perry, has been published, and a pamphlet has been prepared, with brief memoir from Dr. Southwood Smith's "Discourse on Death." Copies of Dr. Drummond's "Epistles of Paul," in the International Handbook Series, and of Mr. Armstrong's "Study of Religion" have been procured from the publishers, and placed for sale in the bookroom. A new tract entitled "Faith in Jesus," by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, has been published. The following tracts have been reprinted:—Tracts for the Times—No. 1, "The Principles and Ideals of Unitarians," by R. A. Armstrong; No. 17, "The Resurrection of Jesus," by Stopford A. Brooke; No. 30, "Main Lines of Unitarianism," by Brooke Herford; No. 27, "Place of Jesus in Religion," by R. A. Armstrong; No. 41, "Why am I a Unitarian?" by J. Freeman Clarke. Leaflets:—No. 16, "Beliefs of a Unitarian," by S. Fletcher Williams; No. 32, "Jesus the Harmoniser," by H. W. Crosskey; No. 23, "Search the Scriptures," by W. Copeland Bowie. A new catalogue of books published by the Association has been issued, and the prices of some of the books have been reduced. A list of tunes in the "Bristol Tune Book," suitable for the hymns in the "Essex Hall Hymnal," has been prepared by Mr. Howard Barnard and Mr. John Harrison, and sent to the ministers of all congregations using the Hymnal, and several letters have been received stating that it will meet a long felt want.

Mission Work.—The Committee have made grants to congregations at the following places for the current year at the rates named:—Ashton-under-Lyne £100, Bedfield £30, Bournemouth £25, Bermondsey £50, Bradford (Manchester) £40, Cardiff £20, Carlisle £45, Chelmsford £15, Chorlton £40, Colyton £10, Congleton £20, Clydach Vale £12 10s., Denton £50, Elland £20, Forest Gate £60, Framlingham £20, Gateshead, &c. £100, Hastings £35, Heaton Moor and Urmston £45, Huddersfield £40, Ilkeston £60, Kentish Town £20, Kilburn £20, Leicester F.C.C. £20, Lewisham £75, Lydgate £10, Lynn to March 31 £7 10s., Mansford-street £20, Newark £18, Newbury £20, Nottage £10, Christ Church (Nottingham) £30, Pentre £12 10s., Plumstead £70, Poole £35, Small Heath £50, Southampton £100, Stepney £20, Stockton £30, Stratford £20, Stratford-on-Avon £50, Torquay £25, Warwick £10, Welsh Services £10, Whitchurch £10, Wick £10. The following grants have been made in aid of the salaries of district missionaries:—London and South Eastern Provincial Assembly £100, South East Wales Society £85, Western Union £62 10s. Grants have also been made in aid of the Mission work in foreign countries:—Budapest £50, Brussels £10, Hungarian Student £50, Melbourne £10, Sydney £75. Special grants have been voted as follows:—Burton-on-Trent £5 for services, Choppington £10 for repairs, Ciliau Aeron £25 for new chapel, Deal £10 for repairs, Gateshead £50 for new iron building, Great Hucklow £10 for enlarging schoolroom, Ipswich £50 for renovation of chapel, Leicester F.C.C. £100 for new building, Loughborough £5 towards debt on church account, Newton Abbot £10 for services, Rochdale £25 towards repairs, Walsall £5 for repairs, Yeovil £16 10s. At the last meeting of the Council the Rev. W. Jellie was present, and good wishes were cordially expressed for his prosperity as the first Unitarian missionary to New Zealand. Letters since received have notified his safe arrival at Sydney, on his way to Auckland, and an excellent impression of his fitness for colonial work appears to have been made upon the Sydney friends, who held a meeting to greet him. The situation in Sydney itself is one of considerable anxiety. The need is urgent for a young, energetic minister, capable of holding his own in that great community, and efforts have been made privately and through the Press, to secure an English minister suitable to the circumstances of the case. At the present moment, however, these efforts have been unsuccessful, and the assistance of any members of the Council towards solving the problem will be gratefully welcomed.

McQuaker Fund.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke visited Scotland during part of November and December, and delivered six lectures—two each at Aberdeen, Edinburgh and Glasgow, and preached once at each place. The lectures were largely attended at all three places. At Aberdeen there were about 400 at the lectures, and 600 at the Sunday Service. It was reported by friends in Scotland that the lectures were eminently useful in spreading more reasonable views of religion. The two lectures will be issued shortly as a booklet, and will be circulated in Scotland. The Rev. E. T. Russell has delivered week-evening lectures at Bridgetown, Springburn, and South Side, and the Rev. Alex. Webster has lectured at Banff, Forres, Fraserburgh, Inverness, Peterhead, Turriff, and Wick. Letters have been sent to all Free Public Libraries in Scotland offering a gift of books for the use of readers. Fifteen libraries have taken advantage of the offer, and 325 books to the value of £30 5s. 3d. have been forwarded.

Work in India.—The Rev. S. Fletcher Williams sends reports from time to time of his visits to different centres in India, and the Committee continue to receive letters of gratitude from natives testifying to the good work he is doing in their country. Mr. Williams has visited Calcutta, Madras, Barisal, Dacca, Mymensingh, Calicut, Coimbatore, &c., and has lectured and preached to very large numbers of people at each place, including the principal people of the town. At Calicut the German missionaries placed their mission hall at the disposal of the Theistic Society on one Sunday, and with their congregation attended the service. It has been reported that at Calicut the gatherings, in religious interest, have never been equalled in the history of the town. In Mr. Williams's last letter he stated that he hoped to go to Assam for a time to escape the extreme effects of the hot season.

Special Services Fund.—The Council will be interested to learn that for the six services by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, held on Sunday mornings, at Little Portland-street Chapel, 750 reserved seat cards were issued on the application of persons residing in all parts of London. On several occasions people had to be sent away for want of room. Mr. Stopford Brooke preached on the evening of Citizen Sunday at Mansford-street, Bethnal-green. Services at Warrington and Swansea were also held, but shortly before Christmas, Mr. Brooke had a serious attack of influenza followed by congestion of the lungs, and he was unable to fulfil his engagements at Wandsworth, Chester, Rochdale, Oldham, Platt, Hull, Burnley, Padiham, and Oxford. Having made a good recovery, on April 8, Mr. Brooke preached at the East Hill Unitarian Church, Wandsworth, to a very large congregation. It is hoped that it will be possible for his promised visits to be made to the other places in the autumn. Arrangements have been made with the Committee at Essex Church, Kensington, for the Rev. Stopford Brooke to preach there on six Sunday mornings from May 27 to July 1 inclusive. Applications for services are still being received, and it is evident that widespread appreciation exists of the great good that these special services have done.

Autumnal Meetings.—The autumnal meetings of the Association were held at Bristol on Nov. 21 and 22. The President, the Treasurer, and the Secretary, Lady O'Hagan, and the Rev. V. D. Davis, attended as the delegates of the Association. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter preached the sermon. At the meeting of the National Conference at Leicester, April 3 to 6, Mr. Charles W. Jones, the President, acted as the representative of the Association. The Secretary and the Rev. Charles Hargrove have been appointed as the delegates to the International Conference of Unitarians to be held at Boston, U.S.A., May 20 to 25.

London Unitarian Bazaar.—With respect to a memorable effort nearer home—namely, the formation of a Permanent Church Building Loan Fund for London, the Committee, although precluded from giving it direct financial support, has, in addition to a vote of books for the Bazaar to be held in May, afforded every facility to the workers engaged in that enterprise, and Essex Hall has been during the winter and spring the scene of unprecedented labours by the numerous committees. The Council will share the hope that this effort may result in permanently strengthening the movement in and about this vast community.

Lantern Slides.—Acting upon a suggestion which had been found fruitful in other directions, the Committee have organised a supply of lantern slides for use at services and meetings, and a catalogue including eighteen sets, and hints to users has been printed for issue. The subjects include Parables, the Life of Jesus, and other Biblical stories, Modern Teachers, Reformers, &c., and a good supply of hymns by Unitarian writers. Nearly 300 slides are thus at disposal, and there can be no doubt that they will be found useful and educative as well as interesting.

Anniversary Meetings.—The following arrangements have been made for the anniversary meetings in Whit-week:—On Wednesday morning, June 6, the annual service will be held at Unity Church, Islington, the preacher being the Rev. Christopher J. Street, M.A., LL.B., of Bolton. On the afternoon of the same day, the annual business meeting will be held at Essex Hall, and a public meeting will be held at the same place in the evening, when the President will give an address on "An Ideal Church," and the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers an address on "Dr. Martineau and Unitarian Christianity." On Thursday morning, June 7, there will be a conference, at which two papers will be read—the first by Mr. Richard Robinson, of Liverpool, on "Possible Developments in Unitarian Missionary Work in England," and the second by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, M.A., on "Opportunities and Methods of Unitarian Work suggested by Experiences in America." On Thursday evening there will be a conversazione at the Royal Institute of Water Colour Painters. It should be added that the President is inviting the delegates from district societies to luncheon after the service on June 6. In regard to meetings of other societies during Whit-week, the annual business meeting of the Sunday-school Association will be held on Tuesday, June 5, followed by tea at six, and an address by Miss Marian Pritchard on "A Glimpse at Sunday-school Work in America." The London ministers have arranged a Communion Service for Wednesday morning, June 6, at Unity Church, Islington, at 10.30. The Central Postal Mission will hold their annual meeting on Thursday afternoon at 2.30, and at 4 at the open conference arranged for ministers from the country by their London brethren, a paper will be read by the Rev. John Byles on "The Christian Minister, as Prophet." On Friday evening the Temperance Association will hold their annual meeting.

The Committee regret to report the death of Sir Henry Tate, Bart., Miss Anna Swanwick, Mr. J. S. Mathers, and the Rev. David Thompson. Sir Henry Tate's widespread and intelligent benevolence had raised his name to honour far beyond our religious community, and his simple Christian piety was as characteristic as his munificent support of educational and philanthropical institutions. Miss Anna Swanwick had also brought lustre to the faith she shared by a life no less of graciousness than of genius. Each of these passed away in a good old age; but in Mr. J. S. Mathers the Committee lost a colleague, and the community at large a zealous worker whose years still promised abundance of service to the causes he held dear. The Rev. David Thompson has also left a name respected by all who knew his work and character. The Council will join the Committee in tendering respectful sympathy to the families bereaved by these losses.

It is also to be recorded here that the Association has lost a life-long member in Dr. James Martineau, who preached the annual sermon as long ago as 1834, and again in 1869, and who to the last maintained a warm interest in the work of the Association. A special resolution in connection with his memory will be submitted to the Council.

The PRESIDENT, having referred to the death of Dr. Martineau as the one event during the past year which overshadowed all others in the history of their churches, spoke of the loss they had also sustained by the death of Miss Swanwick, who was only six years Dr. Martineau's junior, a constant friend of education, and adding lustre to them by her own learning; of Sir Henry Tate, whom he had known from his own boyhood, and of whose many acts of beneficence he would only mention the gift of the library to Manchester College at Oxford; of Mr. J. S. Mathers, whom they mourned as a comparatively young man and a faithful fellow-worker; and of the Rev. David Thompson, revered in his own neighbourhood for his simple life and great piety, so that during his illness neighbouring ministers of other denominations undertook to fill his pulpit and to fulfil pastoral duties for him. Death had also taken from them the Rev. John Wright, a faithful worker for the cause of righteousness and free religion. Having further alluded to several points of interest in the report, and to the generous response which had been made to the appeal for a special Indian Famine Fund, before proceeding to the regular business he called upon Dr. Brooke Herford to move a special resolution.

Dr. HERFORD said that they could not meet without some expression of their regret and reverence at the thought of the passing of their great leader and prophet, James Martineau. He had already spoken of Dr. Martineau in public, and of course much in private, and had listened to characterisations of him, one of which certainly, that by Mr. Stopford Brooke at the Leicester Conference, seemed so surpassingly wise and deep as to take away much inclination for further words. That tribute had already been widely read, and he hoped it would be much more widely read; it emphasised so many varied aspects of his work and influence, of almost all of which they felt the value and the weight. He moved:—

That the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at this its first meeting after the death of the Rev. James Martineau, D.D., LL.D., places on record its deep and abiding sense of the service rendered by him to Unitarian Christianity, of his unequalled spiritual influence on the religious life of our churches, and of his magnificent vindication of the personal relation of the human soul to a Father God. The Council humbly thanks Almighty God for the gift of such a leader and friend, rejoices in that fulness of his years which enabled him to complete his great philosophical works and to see the fruit of his labours, and prays that his courageous devotion to truth, to intellectual freedom and to spiritual religion, may ever inspire the Unitarian Churches of Great Britain, the United States, and of the world.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD regretted the absence of Mr. P. W. Clayden, who was to have seconded the resolution, but was glad for his own part to have that opportunity of humbly offering an expression of his love and reverence. The last time he had seen Dr. Martineau was on one of the days of the autumnal meeting of the Association at Bristol, and remarks that Dr. Martineau had made on the circumstances of the meeting showed his continuing interest and concern for the welfare of the churches. At times he was supposed to say things not very appreciative of Unitarians and Unitarianism; but whenever he felt that the time had come for that, it was to Unitarians themselves that he said it; in the presence of others no one was more forward to vindicate the truth for which Unitarianism stood and the value of their testimony. It was difficult to speak of a man of such large and many-sided character; but he recalled a conversation he had had about twenty years ago with the late John Hamilton Thom, who characterised in a very happy word the leading aspect of Dr. Martineau's life. "Dr. Martineau's nature," Mr. Thom said, "is essentially rhythmical." In that word "rhythmical" they had the outward grace of movement and manner summed up, the beautiful cadence of his voice, the charm of his literary style, and that wonderful gift by which, in the schemes he introduced from time to time, he produced the perfect balance of an harmonious whole. That word, more completely than any other, summed up the characteristics of his nature. Looking at the number of Dr. Martineau's books they could not but be struck by the immense amount of work he did, but there were other channels of his influences, and especially through private correspondence, often with persons unknown to him, his power had been very widely exercised. Many years ago, when he and his friends were anxious lest his life and strength might not last until he had completed and published his works, he had spoken of how his work was interrupted by the extent of his private correspondence; and yet when an instance was recounted to him of how an autograph hunter to obtain his wish had propounded some philosophical question, and had received a long and careful answer, Dr. Martineau said, "Your story amuses me, and proves that the man's cleverness was greater than my discernment. But I would rather be taken in by nine men of the sort you describe than say No to a single honest searcher after truth." That was but an instance of the great generosity of his nature. They all had felt, when they heard in the early part of the year of Dr. Martineau's death, that something had gone out of the world which left them all very much poorer; but their overpowering feeling was one of gratitude that they had been permitted to know him and to come under his influence. He seconded the resolution, which was then passed in reverent silence.

The President, having invited any questions or remarks on the report, Mr. S. S. Tayler referred to the great success of the meetings of the National Conference at Leicester, and reminded the Council that the Conference, like the London Domestic Mission Society, had been founded on the initiative of their Association. He regretted to notice an uneasy feeling in some of their people, who did not seem satisfied that the Conference should fulfil the useful object for which it was founded. He trusted the Conference would not run onto any side line that might interfere with what was more properly the work of the Association.

Miss Sharpe raised a question as to the supply of ministers and the need of definite teaching of Unitarian Christianity, to which Mr. Tarrant and Mr. Nettlefold replied, pointing out that as to ministers the responsibility rested with the congregations themselves and not with the Association.

On the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. Nettlefold, the report was adopted.

It was reported that the following names of deceased members had been removed from the list of the Council:—Mrs. Thomas Colfox, Mr. Arthur Greg, Mr. Benjamin Heape, Sir Philip Manfield, Mr. J. H. Rowland, Miss Swanwick, and the Rev. David Thompson. With these omissions the members of the Council were renominated, with the addition of the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, Mr. H. B. Lawford, and the Rev. W. Wooding.

The following were the nominations for the Executive Committee for 1900-1901:—Mr. G. L. Bristow, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. Edwin Clephan, Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Mr. David Martineau, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C.; Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Charles Fenton, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., the Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., Miss Lawrence, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. J. F. Schwann, J.P., Miss Tagart, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, M.A., and Mr. S. S. Tayler.

Dr. Brooke Herford, who had served on the Committee as ex-President, had been nominated to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. J. S. Mathers. Mr. Charles W. Jones would take Dr. Herford's place on the Committee as ex-President. Mr. Oswald Nettlefold was nominated for re-election as treasurer; and the four trustees (Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Sir Edward Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P.) were also nominated for re-election. It was hoped that at the annual meeting Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., would be elected President in succession to Mr. Charles W. Jones.

There being no other business before the Council, the meeting then terminated.

SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The annual meetings of this Society were held at the West Grove Unitarian Church, Cardiff, on Monday, April 23. The following ministers and delegates were present:—The President, Mr. J. Moy Evans, in the chair; Mr. Lewis N. Williams (treasurer); Mr. John Lewis and the Rev. D. J. Williams (hon. secs.); Aberdare, Rev. E. R. Hughes and Mr. John Evans; Cardiff, Rev. J. Tyssul Davies, B.A.; Mr. W. A. Moore and Mr. G. Carslake Thompson; Merthyr, Mr. and Mrs. Gomer Thomas; Nottage, Rev. W. J. Phillips, Miss Bevan and Miss Morgan; Pontypridd, Rev. Dr. Griffiths and Mr. G. F. Hacker; Swansea, Rev. W. T. Jones, Mrs. Reid and Mr. J. M. Evans; Pentre, Rev. D. Rees; Clydach Vale, Mr. Morgan Everett. There were also present the Revs. R. J. Jones, M.A., J. Hathren Davies, and J. E. Jenkins.

The different committees met in the afternoon to transact the business of the Society. At 4 o'clock the annual meeting was held. The reports from the churches show that the congregations "affiliated to the Society are beginning to recover from the effects of the depression caused by the long-continued dispute in the coal trade, and are looking forward with hopefulness to uninterrupted activity." The committee's annual report and the treasurer's financial statement were adopted. Having served the Society well and admirably for the last two years as President, Mr. J. Moy Evans retires. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded him for his services and his unflagging attention to the work of the Society. Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, of Cardiff, was unanimously elected President for the ensuing year. The following officers were re-elected:—Treasurer, Mr. Lewis N. Williams; secretaries, Mr. John Lewis and Rev. D. J. Williams; auditors, Messrs. Gwillym Griffiths and W. R. Morgan. In compliance with the request of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, the newly-elected President, was appointed delegate to the May Meetings. At the close of the annual meeting, a goodly number of friends sat down to tea, provided in the school-room by the Cardiff friends.

At 6 o'clock a meeting of the Ministers' Union was held, when the Rev. W. T. Jones read a paper on "The High Church Movement and the Higher Criticism." An interesting discussion followed, taken part in among others by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, who was present to preach the annual sermon in the evening. The Chairman, Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., on behalf of himself and his fellow-ministers, welcomed Mr. Wood, in a few well-chosen words, to South Wales.

At 7.30 a religious service was held in the church. The devotional part was conducted by the Rev. E. Robinson Hughes, Aberdare, and the annual sermon by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham. Mr. Wood's subject was, "Is Liberal Christianity a Faith for the Masses?" Taking his text from Mark xii. 37: "And the common people heard him gladly," he asked why it was that Liberal Christianity did not prevail, and the reply was that the tool fitted for its work, but the workman was clumsy in handling it. Its teaching was of life and affection, of heart and conscience, which the people could understand, and would hear gladly, if it were rightly presented. And so with its teaching of the human Christ. They failed from lack of enthusiasm. There could be enthusiasm without fanaticism, and until they had it, and felt that religion did matter, and was their supreme concern, they would not obtain the hearing that they ought to have from the people.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The two counties above named occupy a good space upon the map of England, and have doubtless played a very important part in the past history of our nation, but from the point of view of organised rational religion they are of little importance to-day. Durham with its 1,000 square miles of country, and Northumberland with twice as many, ought, the casual observer would think, to possess between them more than ten Free Churches; but the fact is that both counties are thinly populated, and large towns are very scarce. We may console ourselves with the reflection that there are only five centres whose population numbers over 10,000, where we have not a congregation established: Tynemouth, the Hartlepools, Durham, Bishop Auckland, and Berwick hold out promises for future missionary zeal—zeal which will have to be mixed with more than usual discretion.

Everything here centres on Newcastle. First of all it is by far the largest town, practically a quarter of a million people living within its larger boundaries; in every sense the metropolis of the North, it naturally sets the example to smaller boroughs. Our largest and most influential church is here, the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Missionary Association, the mainspring of all our enterprise, to a very large extent consists of Newcastle folk, and for geographical reasons holds its monthly meetings in this town. The "Church of the Divine Unity" has always occupied a prominent place in Unitarian history, and its long roll of ministers contains names that are honoured throughout the whole body; it has naturally exercised considerable influence upon the religious life of the two counties, and may still be considered the "lantern of the North." Unfortunately for all of us the trimmer and feeder of that lantern is temporarily away from his post through a serious breakdown in health; the Rev. Frank Walters, who so ably sustains the best traditions of Newcastle Unitarianism, has been obliged to take a three months' complete rest, and during his enforced holiday the congregation has had the pleasure of listening to men whose fame is in all the churches; all are looking forward to the return of their minister in May, and trusting that the absolute rest and recuperation which a stay in Torquay affords will have restored him to his usual health and vigour.

While Newcastle is thus temporarily deprived of the services of its trusted leader, we are reminded that Darlington is in a similar but worse condition. The brief stay of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, followed by the even shorter pastorate of the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, gave the people in this town some experience of the joys of having "a minister of your own," and has for ever made it impossible for them to settle down comfortably to the weekly itinerant ministry. The congregation here, though small, is very faithful, the town promises to develope, and to an "earnest, active, thoughtful, courageous, and tactful young minister" (I quote the phraseology of the B. and F. Report), a splendid opening is there afforded. The same can be said of Sunderland, though, perhaps, the dreariness of that town makes the word "splendid" slightly inappropriate. There the fort has been held for some years by an indefatigable lay-worker, Mr. Stirling, but increased financial prosperity encourages the congregation in now seeking to secure the services of a trained minister. In both cases the gentleman appointed would have to content himself with a most modest income, but that is a condition of affairs which, I believe, is by no means peculiar to this district.

Lay-preachers are better appreciated here than in any other part of England, and to our own self-sacrificing band of workers too great a tribute cannot be paid; when it is remembered that for twelve places of worship there are only four recognised ministers, it will be seen that a great deal of the work has to fall upon laymen. I can safely say that for devotion, ability, and effectiveness no Lay Preachers' Union of the same size can exceed our own.

The mission at Byker is entirely in the hands of one of the lay-preaching staff, and for several months the church at South Shields has been under similar care; both places have shown steady improvement and now present a much more hopeful aspect than was theirs a year ago.

Middlesbrough and Stockton are technically included in our local Association, and should be mentioned in any account of doings in the district. At these churches, under the experienced and zealous guidance of the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, there is much sign of active life, and the question of appointing separate ministers is under discussion. Barnard Castle throws in its lot with Darlington, suffers and rejoices with it, and is obliged to be content with the day of small things, and to extract what comfort it can from a pretty but rather empty building. If dogged persistence would do anything for our "forlorn hopes" the church in this little place should by this time have been most successful. As much earnestness, eloquence, and self-sacrifice (not to mention money) have been spent on Barnard Castle as would have sufficed to start and sustain a congregation in one of the five towns mentioned above.

Carlisle is neither in Northumberland nor in Durham, but by strange arrangement is part of our Association. A united congregation, loyal to an earnest and capable leader, wages here a by no means unsuccessful fight against an orthodoxy of the most ancient type; the influence of the cathedral is everywhere, the population is not very large, their church is an expensive one to maintain, and their theological isolation is most complete, yet the Unitarians of Carlisle are full of courage and determination and in many ways set an example to more favoured congregations.

Amongst the mining population it was realised by those in the past generation or two who were gifted with the missionary spirit that there was abundant opening for our simple and sufficient faith; much work was accomplished in the pit villages by the Rev. George Harris and the men he inspired, but unfortunately owing to the continual fluctuation and consequent movement of population which affects the coal-mining industry, no permanent memorial remains of their labours. Here and there we come across records of services being regularly held for years, of a room being hired and even a church being built, a period of influence and prosperity followed by either a sudden or a gradual cessation of work in the district, exodus of the people and reluctant abandonment of the cause. The devotion expended on these movements has however not been lost, for all over the country, yes, and all over the world, are to be found to-day staunch Unitarians whose fathers first heard the glad gospel in some Northumberland or Durham pit village, having attended a cottage service or been induced to enter the barn-like building that did duty for a Unitarian chapel.

At Choppington to-day we have, as the result of the labours of the Rev. J. C. Street, a well-established church. Situated right in the midst of the collieries, its fortunes fluctuate with those of the mining industry; at present things are very well; the building has lately been renovated and refitted and the congregations have considerably improved. A sale of work, held at Easter, realised some £20 towards settling the accounts for the renovation.

Not many miles from Choppington is Ashington—perhaps the largest colliery in the world; close on twelve thousand people live here, and there is promise of further extension. In a very humble way we have started a mission in this place; beginning in a private house, we have now ventured to engage a small hall (an auction room!), and there services are regularly held every Sunday morning. Every denomination of importance is represented in Ashington by a church building, and we have reason to hope that the result of our modest effort here will be the establishment of another church truly worthy the name "Free."

I have left till last what is, after all, the most interesting and important new movement in these two counties—the church at Gateshead. Few would credit that until two years ago, in a town of one hundred thousand people, no Unitarian church existed; but such was the fact, though many endeavours had been made in times past to remove this blot on our denominational fame. Gateshead is to Newcastle as Birkenhead is to Liverpool, with this difference, that Gateshead is almost entirely a town of working-men; there are a few wealthy inhabitants, but every year their number grows less as they flee before the encroaching builder whose unbroken lines of brick and slate devastate what were once pleasant villa grounds or open fields. Beginning in a hired hall, our movement under the auspices of the N. and D.U.A. has gathered strength, and the church has now decided to make for permanency by securing premises of its own; a very suitable site has been secured, and it has been decided to erect at once an ornamental but temporary iron church; an appeal has been issued for help in this direction, and the B. and F.U.A. have endorsed it with a promise of £50. The total amount to be raised is £500, that is if the land is to be purchased outright, as seems most desirable. Towards this the congregation has altogether £200 in promises and cash. It was at first determined that the church should be named after our great departed leader—"The Martineau Memorial Church"; but, yielding to the advice and persuasions of many of the best known friends of the cause of liberal religion, the congregation has decided to substitute the title "Unity Church." Although, in deference to the expressed wish of those whose opinions they are bound to respect, the Gateshead people have deprived themselves of the honour they at first contemplated, yet with an absolutely open trust-deed and an undenominational name a humble attempt will be made to establish in the midst of this large working-class population just such a church as Martineau desired to see in every town. The treasurer of the Building Fund informs me that some £250 are still wanted to make him quite happy!

It is my lot to come closely into touch with our Liberal Christian work up here, and to know a little of other social and religious movements in the district. I can certify that there is a great work waiting for us to do, one which we alone are qualified to undertake, and which, if neglected, will cloud our memory with dishonour. In this district we find Unitarians who are wide awake and alive to their great opportunities, others, we discover, are practically asleep, while here and there are a few, self-satisfied and irresponsible, to whom the words "missionary zeal" convey no intelligible meaning; awake, asleep, or indifferent, they are "canny folk," and as that expression represents the acme of Northern compliment, it forms a fitting conclusion to this letter.

The Rev. S. Fletcher Williams has contributed an article on "Agnosticism" to the Hindu, of Madras (March 24). A Paper from his pen appears in the Indian Mirror, of Calcutta (April 4), on "Religion and Modern Thought." He has also contributed, at the Editor's request, an article on "The Problem of Prayer" to No. 2 of The Theistic Light, a quarterly magazine published at Calicut, Malabar, in the Madras Presidency. For No. 1 of the same magazine he wrote, by invitation, an exposition of "The Principles of Liberal Religion." Some of these articles have been reproduced in several Indian journals.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—At the recent election of the Aberdeen School Board, the Rev. Alexander Webster, who in 1897 headed the poll, and has since held the position of Chairman of the Board, was again elected, standing third on the list. If Mr. Webster had not been absent from home, enjoying a much-needed holiday in Italy, and had been able to take a personal part in the contest, he would doubtless have obtained a much larger poll.

Belfast : Mountpottinger. — The annual children's soirée was held in the church on Wednesday, April 18. A larger number of prizes were distributed to the children than for some years back. A very pleasant entertainment was provided by friends, and addresses were given by Mr. Napier, superintendent, and the Rev. W. J. Davies. The school, which is at present obliged to meet in the church, is looking forward to entering into possession of their new hall before another winter is over.

Bwlchyfadfa.—On Easter Sunday the annual meeting of the Sunday-schools of Bwlchyfadfa and Llwynrhydowen was held at the above chapel. The service was conducted by Mr. E. O. Jenkins, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester. First the children went through their work, which consisted in answering questions on the life of Jesus. Then the two schools recited together Mark xiv., and were catechised in it by Mr. Jenkins. Everything passed off in such a manner as to reflect great credit both on the teachers and the taught. The attendance also both of members of the schools and of others was good.

Choppington.—On Saturday last the congregation gathered together to welcome in their midst the Rev. James C. Street, who thirty-two years ago was responsible for the starting of the church.

Eastbourne.—A combined meeting of the Natural History and Photographic Societies was held at the Caldecott Museum on Friday, the 20th, and there was a full attendance. The Rev. George St. Clair gave a description of a tour in Palestine, the narrative being illustrated with 100 lantern views. The company showed great interest, and Dr. Adams, President, returned thanks for what he described as a great treat—an instructive and lucid lecture, lighted up with humour.

Leigh : Lancashire.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last, afternoon and evening, by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester. The services were conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin (minister). Special hymns and anthems were sung by the children of the school, assisted by the choirs of Leigh and Atherton. There was a good attendance in the afternoon, and at the evening service the congregation was probably the largest that had ever assembled in the building. The new organ was very generally appreciated, and every one seemed delighted to hear Mr. Steinthal again.

London : Highgate.—Rev. J. T. Sunderland announces a series of five Sunday evening sermons on "Dr. Martineau and his Teachings," as follows:—April 29: "Dr. Martineau's Life." Illustrated with the Rev. Frank Freeston's fine set of slides. May 6: "Dr. Martineau's Doctrine of Ethics." May 13: "His View of God." May 20: "His View of the Bible." May 27: "His View of Jesus." On April 23, the Sunday-school of the Highgate Church will give its annual concert.

London : Forest Gate.—At a congregational meeting held after the service on Sunday evening five of the elder members of the committee tendered their resignations, which, after a brief discussion, were accepted. On the motion of the Rev. H. W. Perris the hearty thanks of the congregation were given them for past services. Mr. Walter Young, LL.B., was then elected treasurer, and Mr. Frank Kilburn secretary; Messrs. Brown and Burnup, with the addition of a lady member, were appointed to fill the other vacancies. Great sympathy was felt for Mr. G. J. Stanfield, whose absence was partly accounted for by recent severe family bereavement.

London : Peckham.—A combined Congregational and Literary Society Social Meeting was held on Tuesday, in the schoolroom at Avondale-road, under the presidency of the Rev. G. Carter. Reports were given of the various institutions affiliated with the church, and from these it appeared that there had been a slight improvement in the Sunday-school; an appreciable increase in the Band of Hope; satisfactory meetings, on the whole, of the Literary Society; and good work in the gymnasium. The minister welcomed six new church members. On the other hand, he sorrowfully announced the loss, by death that day, of the doyen of the congregation, Mr. H. J. Begg, to whose character he paid a warm tribute of admiration. A resolution of sympathy with the family was passed, and it was further decided to send a wreath of flowers in the name of the church.

Middlesbrough.—On Sunday last, April 22, the anniversary services of Christ Church were conducted by the Rev. Halliwell Thomas, of Doncaster. There were very good congregations, morning and evening. On Monday a successful tea was held in the schoolroom, after which Mr. Lyners, the organist, gave an organ recital in the church; the after meeting resolved itself into a conversazione, with occasional musical selections by the members and friends of the choir, and a very pleasant evening was spent.

Padiham.—This week has brought a cloud over the congregation of Nazareth Chapel, owing to the death, at the age of fifty-six, of Mrs. Alfred Blezard, who had returned less than two years ago to her native town with her husband and two daughters, having lived for some dozen years in Russia. Mrs. Blezard was a zealous worker and worshipper at the chapel, and the beauty and gentleness of her mind and spirit will be long and keenly missed by all who came in contact with her. The heartfelt sympathy of the town and congregation will be with Mr. Blezard and his two daughters in their loss.

Sheffield.—The annual parents' tea and distribution of funds of the Sick and Saving Society, in connection with the Upper Chapel Sunday-school, which was held in the Channing Hall, on Wednesday, the 18th, resulted in a very successful gathering, over which the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., presided. The society's annual statement of accounts showed receipts to the amount of £136 0s. 7d., of which £118 11s. 7d. was returned to the members in the shape of savings, and a dividend of 2s. 6d. on the amount (4s. 4d.) contributed to the sick fund. The tea was followed by an entertainment. There was a large attendance, and the evening was in every sense an encouraging one.

Stannington.—On Sunday, the 15th inst., the usual Easter services were held, the preachers being in the afternoon the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., and in the evening the Rev. Iden Payne. Owing partly to strong cold winds the congregations were not so large as usual, but the collections were a little in excess of last year. On the following Tuesday the annual social tea was held in the schoolroom, after which a very enthusiastic meeting was held, under the presidency of the Rev. I. Payne, and addresses were delivered by the Chairman, the Revs. J. E. Manning, M.A., J. Ellis, and J. Lee (Congregational minister of the neighbouring village of Loxley). During the evening suitable hymns were sung, and songs by Mr. and Mrs. G. Vickers and Mr. E. Wild, and recitations by Messrs. Luke Oates and Heber Revitt. The meeting closed with prayer and the benediction.

Swansea.—On Wednesday and Thursday, April 18 and 19, a successful bazaar was held in the Shaftesbury Hall with the object of clearing off a debt of £300, which for some years had been a burden on the Unitarian Church. The bazaar was opened on the first day by the Mayoress, Miss Watkins, and on the second day by Lady Llewelyn. Votes of thanks were moved and seconded on each occasion by Mrs. Reid and Mr. J. Moy Evans, Miss Brock and Mr. C. H. Perkins respectively, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, minister of the church, presiding. The takings on the first day amounted to nearly £100, and with donations to £180. The total result was very satisfactory to all concerned.

The Scottish Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—On Saturday last a meeting of the Committee, appointed to draft the rules of the Union, was held at Kirkcaldy. The Revs. H. Williamson and A. Ernest Parry (hon. sec. pro tem.), and others were present. The secretary read the draft rules and the suggestions received from the various School Committees, and it was resolved to submit the proposed rules to a general meeting, to be held on Saturday, May 19 next. It was agreed to approach the Edinburgh friends with a view to holding the meeting there. A vote of thanks to the Kirkcaldy School Committee for providing tea concluded the business.

York.—After evening service at St. Saviourgate Chapel last Sunday a number of the congregation presented Mr. E. F. Lewin, their chairman, with a handsome marble timepiece with this inscription:—"Presented to Mr. E. F. Lewin by members of the St. Saviourgate Chapel, York, in recognition of his services in the cause of religious liberty."

Persecution has often won in human history; often has a violent hand dashed out the lamp of truth.—John Morley.

WHILE the burden of the war in South Africa remains constantly with us, and the terrible calamity of the Indian famine, as to which we publish a further letter from the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, there was added last week the news of another great disaster, small indeed in proportion to the other two, but in itself appalling, though happily not accompanied by such great loss of life as might have been expected. The destruction by fire of the town of Hull and a good part of Ottawa, the Canadian seat of Government, rendered close upon 20,000 persons homeless, and deprived some 5,000 of their means of livelihood. But the sufferings thus caused have been met with great courage and resolution, and the Mother Country, through a Mansion House Fund and in other ways has been quick to express its warm sympathy with the Canadians.

THE Archbishops of Canterbury and York have emphatically condemned the practice of Reservation of the Sacrament in the Church of England, giving their decisions at Lambeth on May 1, after the pleadings for and against the practice which they heard in July of last year. The Guardian admits that, as the Prayer Book and the law now stand, the decision was inevitable. The extreme High Churchmen are thus given to understand that they must either submit in unwilling obedience or go out from the Church, unless they can obtain an alteration of the law. The twenty-eighth article unequivocably forbids that the Sacrament should be "reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped," pointing to the gross abuses which had grown out of the Roman doctrine, which have shown signs of recrudescence among a certain section of the Anglican clergy. Both prelates included in their decisions some very wholesome advice as to fasting and the real value and meaning of communion regarded in a spiritual light.

MR. PROTAB CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR did not reach London last week in time for any public announcemont to be made, as we had hoped, of his preaching on Sunday, but the congregation at Highgate had the pleasure of welcoming him at the evening service, and of hearing his voice once more. Mr. Mozoomdar hopes that on his return from America later in the year he may be able to spend some time in this country and to render some service both in the pulpit and on the platform, to deepen the sympathetic interest of English people in the social and spiritual needs of India, and at the same time to renew out of his own growing experience the message which Indian Theism has for our religious life.

ON the eve of his departure from Calcutta Mr. Mozoomdar delivered a short farewell address to the members of his community, at a devotional service in his own house, which is published in The Interpreter and the New Dispensation of April 8. In this address Mr. Mozoomdar begs his friends to remember that the faith they cherish, with all its unfolding verities, is the incipient and growing faith of the best part of mankind, and he urges that individual opinions and beliefs shall not be confounded with the universal principles of the Spirit's Dispensation to all times and to all nations. "Neither rationalism nor ritualism is the destined goal of progressive religion, they are but wayside shelters to the Great Home, passing means to an everlasting end." And as to the spirituality of their religion, he adds :—

It is the ceaseless communion of our souls with the hallowed and blessed Spirit of God. Our devotional life is our highest life. Our public devotions are quite important, but our private personal devotions are still more important, and they are bound to have the depth, intensity, warmth, and tender truthfulness without which prayer and praise lose all reality. Emotions and impulses are the very life-breath of spiritual life, but emotions must be balanced at all times by faith and insight. Spiritual faith has the profoundest insight and discrimination, the true light that comes to man is the wisdom of faith. Faith in the Spirit of God, is not a cold abstract conception, nor is it a blind unreasoning mania. It is founded on the very instinct and sense of religion in the soul. It is the result of God-seeing of which every spiritually-minded man is capable. We not only believe but behold the face of God in the mirror of outward nature. On the pages of history it is His handwriting. In the events of the religious world it is the progressive dispensation of His purpose worked out. In every prayerful man's life it is His direct dealing, whether it be a life of joy or sorrow. Our faith-inspired insight recognises the powers and lineaments of the Spirit-Father at every step we take, and His love encompasses us in every trial into which we are thrown.

And further, having insisted that in their religion there must be the culture of the whole spiritual nature, Mr. Mozoomdar adds :—

The great religions of the world and the great men of the world have given shape to these various powers and principles of the Spirit. It is our utmost concern, therefore, to accept and assimilate the ideals of those great religions and great men. We must adopt the soul-insight of the Upanishads, the self-extinction and humanity of Buddha, the devotional ecstasy of the Vaishnavas, the monotheism of the Jews, Mohammedans, and Sikhs, but supreme and above all, the religion of Divine Sonship left in the world by Jesus of Nazareth. In making this my last pilgrimage to Christendom my object shall be to establish that the religion of the Brahmo Somaj and the religion of Jesus Christ is one religion, that India's spiritual future and the great world's spiritual future is one future, that in the vast tides that are steadily rushing Godward in the eternal oceans of truth and righteousness we Indians and the far off Westerns have launched our barks, frail as they may seem, for one great goal !

In conclusion, he insists on the supreme importance of personal character in all religious life. "There is no lofty personal character without the pure heart, and a pure heart there cannot be without the deepest love both for God and man." To help toward that end a great human exemplar is needed, and this Mr. Mozoomdar finds in Jesus Christ, Son of God and Son of Man, whom Keshub Chunder Sen also called "Master." He is the human pattern of perfection.

Munkacsy, the famous Hungarian painter, died at a sanatorium near Bonn, on May 1, and was thus liberated from the shadow of incurable mental disease, which for some time past had withdrawn him from the world. Born in 1844, a boy of quite humble origin, apprenticed to a carpenter, by indomitable force of genius he made his way, and was enabled as a young man to study art at Munich, and in 1870 began to exhibit in the Paris Salon. In his "Christ before Pilate," his most famous picture, first exhibited in 1881, we have, perhaps, the noblest representation of Jesus, in his simple humanity, which modern art has produced. "Calvary" followed, and the "Ecce Homo," under the strain of completing which Munkacsy's career as an artist was sadly brought to a close.

In the April number of Manchester Faces and Places there appear very appropriately side by side, with full-page portraits of each, appreciative notices of the Rev. F. D. Cremer, the broad-minded vicar of Eccles, and the Rev. P. M. Higginson, minister of Monton Church. To the notice of Mr. Higginson there is appended an expression of great regret that he has felt obliged to resign his pulpit for reasons of health, and the wish is added that Manchester may not be called upon to lose "the very conspicuous service of so gifted a minister, and so true a man." Then follows an interesting account of Monton Church and a full description of the two series of new windows, such as has already appeared in these columns. There is also a picture of the church. THE INDIAN FAMINE.

Sir,—May I say a few words more in your columns about the need in India?

It is most gratifying and encouraging that the suggestion of a Unitarian Famine Fund has been taken up so heartily, and that contributions have been so prompt and generous. I want to warn against the possible feeling that with this excellent beginning we have done enough, or that the need is now practically over. The truth is the need is increasing every day, and will increase until September, which is the earliest possible date at which any substantial harvest can be reaped. This means that there should be no sign of abatement of effort in England to help the sufferers until September at least. Indeed, it means a great deal more than that. It means that unless the English people, as a whole, wake up to their responsibility to a degree that there is yet little sign of, there seems to be no way of escape from one of the most terrible calamities of modern times. The English are a sympathetic and a generous people. One wonders, therefore, at the present apathy. The contrast is so strange and painful between now and three years ago. The famine of 1897 was on a much smaller scale than this; indeed, on the 1st of April, 1897, the number of persons on the relief works in India was 2,800,000. Now the number is over 5,000,000. Yet the Mansion House Fund then amounted to £470,000, while on the 1st of April this year it had reached less than £160,000. Thus, measuring by the Mansion House Fund, England is doing only about one-sixth as much for India to-day, according to the need, as she did three years ago. Why is this? Why does not the Lord Mayor of London call a great public meeting to arouse the people? Why are not great public meetings called in other cities of the Kingdom? Cannot our influential Unitarians do something in this direction? At least let us continue to do all we can individually and in our churches. Many of our people have not yet given who, I am sure, will give gladly. Some of our churches have not yet contributed. Have we told the pathetic story of India's suffering to the children of our Sunday-schools, and asked them to bring their pennies and their half-pennies? If our Unitarian faith in the brotherhood of all men means anything, it should show its practical fruit at a time like this.

I had written, so far, when the postman brought me a letter, which I immediately opened. It was from a lady friend in India, the wife of an English banker there. For months she has been doing all in her power for the suffering people. She writes me some details regarding the situation, hoping I may be able to do something to awaken the people of England to India's distress. Let me quote a few sentences:—

"This district," she says, "has 71,000 inhabitants, and at the present moment 40,000 are starving. In the month of January 120 persons were found dead within the limits of a small Cantonment. Since then things are much worse. It is horrible to go into the poor bare homes of the people and see a row of living skeletons sitting waiting for death. They look up when I go in, and say 'Salaam,' and then relapse into silence. Every tree capable of being used that way has been stripped of its bark for food. Every palm tree has been cut down, pounded between stones and eaten; and now only the black rocks and sun-dried mud remain. All cattle are eaten up or dead. How earnestly we hope that charity will come to our aid! Does England realise what our suffering is? If there is much delay it will be too late. It is feared that not more than 50 per cent. of the people of this district can now be saved: and unless substantial aid comes soon scarcely 10 per cent. can be expected to live until July. Will not the rich in England give? Will not even the poorest give? Even pennies are thankfully received. One penny will keep the life in a man for twenty-four hours."

There is more in the letter as pathetic and terrible as this. And this is only a sample of the word that is coming, and will be sure to come more and more in the trying months that are ahead. In the face of such conditions, it is amazing that so little is being done in England,—that all our great cities are not calling public meetings, and that the Mansion House Fund has not reached at least a million pounds, instead of the pitifully inadequate sum that it now represents. Will not England awake to her responsibility before it is too late? Does war dry up sympathy and destroy interest in everything except war? England is rich and well fed. She has drawn no insignificant part of her great wealth from her Indian dependency. Even a fraction of what her people receive each year from India would relieve all these famine sufferers.

It is plain that we have begun our Unitarian Indian Famine Fund none too early. It will be of inexpressible value to thousands. Let us not close it so long as men, women, and children are starving. Besides giving all we can ourselves, both as individuals and as churches, let us do whatever lies within our power to awaken our various communities and the nation as a whole, to India's appalling need and our heavy responsibility.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

The Criticism of the Old Testament.

II.

Ewald and his Contemporaries—from about 1830 to 1870.

Old Testament criticism, as we have seen, made rapid progress towards the close of the last, and in the first decades of the present, century. On the whole the energy of Hebrew scholars was well directed, and much of the ground which they occupied is held by their successors at this day, as a permanent acquisition. Now in tracing this advance we had to speak of scholars little known except by name to students of our generation. Few still left among us have read many consecutive pages of Eichhorn or De Wette, and though the name of Gesenius is still familiar, his reputation rests chiefly on a grammar and dictionary which still bear his name on the title-page, but which have been altered and enlarged so much that they can no longer be regarded as his.* When we turn to the middle of this century, our task in one respect at least is easier. The merest tyro knows well the great name of Ewald, and would have something to say about the illustrious scholars who lived about the same time. There must be many in our midst who recall with gratitude the time when first they fell under the influence of his contagious enthusiasm, and felt that the Hebrew Bible had become to them a new book, nay, that all life had received a new interest and impulse. In his own line he stood supreme. Dillmann was to the last his faithful, though independent, disciple. Hitzig, Hupfeld, Delitzsch and many other distinguished men, were his debtors and, beyond all question, his inferiors. From more than one point of view the golden age of Hebrew scholarship set in with him. Yet it is at first sight disappointing to find that the most brilliant scholars of the time made few notable and permanent contributions to Biblical criticism. In other words, little fresh light was thrown on the origin and date of the Biblical documents. Ewald, however, deepened immeasurably the existing knowledge of the Hebrew language, theology, and religion. Meanwhile real advance, though as yet it attracted no great attention, was being made in the severance of the Hexateuch into its component parts, and a way was being prepared for those critical discoveries which belong to the third and closing period of the century.

Ewald was born at Göttingen in 1803. There he studied under Eichhorn, and there he spent most of his professional life, though he held a chair at Tübingen from 1848 to 1866. His career was one of storm and stress: he mingled in the political as well as in the theological fray. He was driven from Göttingen to Tübingen. At Tübingen he was at deadly enmity with his colleague Baur: he returned with intense relief to his old home at Göttingen; but there, after a time, he was forbidden to lecture by the Government. He was a man of passionate convictions, one who clung to the Christian revelation as to his very life. He knew the value of the Old Testament as a preparation for the New. He fought a noble battle with that false and barren orthodoxy which "stands bluff against plain matter of fact," and with that far more barren criticism which is impotent to understand, because it has no heart to feel, the religion of the Bible. True, he was often violent and self-opinionated, though always noble, reverent, sincere. Here, however, we are concerned simply with Ewald's services to the study of the Old Testament.

First, then, he was the founder of scientific Hebrew grammar. He had an instinctive genius for subtle differences of language, with a wide and minute knowledge of Semitic speech in all its forms then accessible. But instead of merely amassing facts he exhibited these facts in their organic connection, and established, as the empirical method of Gesenius could not do, the principles of Hebrew grammar. The first edition of his Hebrew grammar appeared in 1827, and received its definitive form in 1870. Canon Driver bears witness to Ewald's "originality and penetration," and adds that "there is probably no modern Hebraist who is not directly or indirectly indebted to him." Another excellent judge—Dr. A. B. Davidson—describes Ewald's Hebrew syntax as "a complete and indispensable thesaurus of the language." Yet to Ewald grammar was but the key to unlock the treasures of Hebrew thought. His commentaries in the Poetical Books (1839), and on the Prophets (1840-1841), were unlike anything which had preceded them, and we have had nothing of the same quality since. Of course, they are in some ways out of date. Ewald could not anticipate the light which was to be cast on prophetic times by the cuneiform inscriptions; he was far too ready to accept the text of the prophets as it stands; and he attributed to David psalms breathing a spirit of pure monotheism such as was unknown in David's time. He had also an extsnsive confidence in his own power to divine the date and occasion of individual psalms.

For all that, these commentaries have the gift of perpetual youth, and one can return to them again and again with unfailing instruction and delight. For Ewald made the thought of Hebrew poets and prophets his own. Instead of Eichhorn's aesthetic criticism, Ewald entered into the very heart of Hebrew religion. He indulges in no rabbinical fancies, no modern sentimentalism; his thought is always Hebrew through and through. Lastly, Ewald was the first great historian of Israel. Here it would be easy for very commonplace people to point out defects. Serious misconceptions were inevitable when the origin and order of the Hebrew codes was still so imperfectly understood. Nevertheless, when a great master had once exhibited his view of Hebrew history as a connected whole, he had himself opened the gate for further progress and provided the best corrective for his own errors.

Ewald in his own time stood first and in a sense alone, but there were other scholars who held a distinguished place, though they cannot be put side by side with him. Of these the first, perhaps, was Hitzig, who for insight into the nature of a Hebrew sentence had no need to fear comparison with Ewald himself. It is this linguistic tact which makes it still well worth while to consult his commentaries on Isaiah, the Minor Prophets and the Psalms. Much more clearly than Ewald, who sometimes ignored the principles of his own grammar and construed through thick and thin, Hitzig saw that the Massoretic text was often plainly corrupt, that it could not be regarded as final and authoritative. He was aware that occasional emendation was not enough, and that a critical text of the Hebrew Bible was absolutely necessary. He felt, in short, that Hebrew scholars must deal with the text of the Old Testament as Greek scholars had dealt with the text of the Classics and (at last) with that of the New Testament. At this very hour this desideratum is being supplied for the first time by the concerted labour of English, German, and American scholars. But it is Hitzig's merit that he divined the work which had to be done, and this is no small praise. Much less can be said for his attempt to substitute positive criticism of the Psalms for the negative criticism of De Wette. In fact, fanciful theory was Hitzig's snare, and want of sober judgment his radical defect. Even his learning sometimes only ministered to his extravagance of speculation. What, for instance, are we to think of a scholar who seriously maintains that El Shaddai is translated from the Persian Ormuzd, that Jehovah is also a translation but from the Armenian, that Seraph is only another form of Serapis? After all, an ounce of common sense is worth a pound of learning. So, again, his elaborate theory on the Aryan origin of the Philistines is remembered only as a curiosity, and his history of Israel is as good as forgotten. To Hitzig's name we may add that of Thenius, who in his commentaries on Samuel (1842) and Kings (1849) awoke attention to the great value of the Septuagint for recovery of the primitive Hebrew text. Mention also should be made of two commentaries on the Psalms—that of Hupfeld (1855-1862), cautious and sceptical, learned and clear, that of Olshausen (1853), who, notwithstanding his exaggerated belief in Maccabean psalms, certainly did good work by opposing the attempt then common to deny the existence of such psalms on a priori grounds, and by insisting that for the study of the Psalter the circumstances of Maccabean times should be kept habitually in view. Nor should it be forgotten that the school which held fast to the traditional views revived greatly towards the middle of this century, and rendered real service to Biblical study. Ewald's contemporary, Hengstenberg (1802-1869), was a true scholar, and though he stoutly defended many hopeless positions, at all events enabled men to see once for all what could be said for the authenticity of Daniel ("Contributions to the Study of the Old Testament," vol. i., 1831), and for the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (Id., vols. ii. and iii., 1839-9). He produced evidence, e.g., that Hosea knew part of the Pentateuch and thus stimulated inquiry into the component parts of the Pentateuch and their dates. There were other learned men who served in the same camp, without that entire devotion to controversy which characterised Hengstenberg. Thus Keil wrote useful commentaries in the Pentateuch and the Historical Books, besides a manual of Hebrew Archæology, able and good in its way. Of far higher quality was the work of the elder Delitzsch (1813-90), a man of profound learning and various accomplishments, of fine linguistic talent and of poetic fancy, which sometimes unfortunately led him into mere fancifulness. Of his numerous writings, his commentaries on Genesis, Isaiah, and the Psalms, all of which ran through many editions, are probably the best known. He was justly beloved for the noble simplicity of his character, the deep and ardent piety of his life and writings. In his old age he gave a splendid example of courageous candour. He gradually abandoned positions for which he had fought long and hard and, without the least injury to his hold on the Christian revelation, adopted the sure results of Old Testament criticism.

We are, however, anticipating changes which belong to our next and last article. Here we can but note in conclusion such advance in the criticism of the Hexateuch as falls within our present period. As early as 1823 Ewald, then a youth of nineteen, wrote a book on the "Composition of Genesis." When more mature, he himself treated this attempt to maintain the unity of Genesis as a juvenile work which only represented a phase through which he had passed at the beginning of his career. Still, apart from the phenomenal learning which it displayed, it was a powerful attack on the current theory that Genesis was made up of fragments originally independent of each other. It exhibited the unity of purpose which runs through Genesis. Retaining his grasp on this principle, he applied it in 1831 to the whole Hexateuch, and proved that the document which gives the former account of the Creation, i.e., the account contained in Genesis i.-ii. 4, and which never uses the name Jehovah in pre-Mosaic times is the Grundschrift or framework into which additions from other documents have been fitted. In other hands this became the "supplement" theory, i.e., it was believed that the Grundschrift or Elohistic document had been supplemented by another writer called the Jahvist, because he uses the name Jehovah from the beginning. Just a century after Astruc, Hupfeld, whose commentary on the Psalms has been mentioned above, took a notable step forward. He demonstrated that two authors* avoid the use of the name Jehovah in pre-Mosaic times, and that one of these whom Hupfeld calls the "Second Elohist" is far more closely related in thought and style to the Jahvist than to the Elohist of the Grundschrift. This part of the inquiry was completed by Nöldeke, who in 1869 pointed out what did and did not belong to the First Elohist, i.e. to the writer of the Grundschrift. Subsequent criticism has found little to alter in Nöldeke's work. Great changes were to come in the view taken as to the date and origin of the documents which compose the Hexateuch. But now, at least, these documents, four in all—namely, the Grundschrift, the book of the Second Elohist, that of the Jahvist, that of the Deuteronomist—were recognised. Two of them, the Grundschrift and the Deuteronomistic document, could be clearly distinguished. To some extent all the documents could be studied separately and compared with each other, with the rest of Hebrew literature and with the known facts of Hebrew history.

* Hupfeld had been anticipated by Ilgen ("Urkunden des ersten Buchs von Moses") as early as 1798, but Ilgen's book had no influence, and was soon forgetten. Yet nothing can be better than Ilgen's analysis of the history of Joseph.

LITERATURE.

DANTE'S PARADISE.*

MUCH were it to be desired that all persons capable of understanding and appreciating the masterpieces of the world's literature had likewise skill to read them in the original with ease and certainty. If we all knew Greek and Latin and French and German and Italian as well as our native English, and knew them so well that we could take up any classic of these tongues, and read it as readily as we read —well, to moderate our ambition, let us not say Milton or Shakespeare, but Chaucer! Alas, graduates of the University, men who put M.A. after their names (which I heard once explained by 'Arry to 'Arriet as "wot they allays put after the names of ministers," though, indeed, it is not to be obtained so readily as a pulpit sometimes is, and its accompanying prefix) —even they are prone for the most part to confess, as Mr. Wicksteed once said to me, "It is not good for Greek to be alone." It isn't that we would for a moment admit our incompetence to translate any ordinary passage that might be set before us; for the pretence of knowledge is always available to cloak the nakedness of our ignorance, when once we have outgrown the brutal authority of examiners, whose business it is to strip the young of their poor rags of self-conceit. But, whether we could or could not get on without a translation, certain it is that a translation saves time and trouble to the mature reader, as well as to the school boy.

Scholars used to recognise it without shame, and all the old editions of Greek authors are printed side by side with a Latin version —by no means always of the most correct, but helpful still to get along by. Only in later days, Germany having set the evil example, has it grown the custom to set the text before the reader, with the insolent assumption that if he couldn't read it like a native to the manner born, he was not worthy to read at all.

The gross immorality of using a "crib" was so impressed upon us in school days—though, indeed, a judicious use even then would have wonderfully helped and quickened our understanding of the originals, painfully and fearfully sweated out word by word in scraps of twenty lines a day—that we have never quite got over a sense of shame in a handy English rendering made not only accessible but even inseparable from the text. Yet for men and women of average scholarship, while they may be adepts in one or more languages, there will be others with which their acquaintance is imperfect, and where the help of a translation will just make the difference between being able to read the original, or being entirely dependent on the translator.

So those who do know Italian more or less, may heartily thank Mr. Wicksteed for having given us the "Paradiso" of Dante with a parallel translation, so literal and ready to eye that he who runs may read—if, indeed, any intelligent reader there be who imagines he can understand Dante at a run. For in truth the "Divine Comedy" is no easy reading even to the fellow-countryman of the author. The very simplicity of the "vulgar tongue" he uses is apt to be a snare, and make us think we know what the meaning is, because we know what the words mean: and it is good to have at hand another's rendering of the sense were it only to check our own by.

We owe much already to Messrs. Dent for the delightful series of handy classics they have provided for learners and for scholars. Our gratitude in this instance is largely an anticipation of favours to come. How immense would be the boon, to us who do business far from the haunts of learning, and have forgotten so much we knew in other days, to have a series of choicest masterpieces in the original—more or less understanded of such as we, who never have been or have long ceased to be accomplished scholars, and have forgotten grammar and shed our vocabulary with our youthful locks; but, because only more or less, and probably enough less understanded, therefore in condescension to our infirmity, accompanied with just such a translation as this of Mr. Wicksteed's.

For what we want is not an independent work, with its own distinctive merits as poetry or prose. Neither Homer nor Chapman would gain by being set side by side, just by reason of the supreme excellence of the translation, which is, as Coleridge writes, "as truly an original poem as the 'Fairie Queene.'" Let who can read Greek, and who cannot, read Chapman; both alike (and the former will probably have no superiority over the latter in this respect) may appreciate in the Elizabethan poet the Homeric spirit, and share a portion of the intense delight which made the unlearned Keats shout aloud as for the first time he read certain passages of might. Such works of genius are rare, and publishers cannot buy them, nor any goodwill and perseverance furnish them; what we want is the humbler labour of the diligent student and scholar who will take us by the hand, and lead us the way he knows, and help us over our difficulties.

And admirably has Mr. Wicksteed performed the task he set himself, and that no easy one nor indeed capable of any but approximate accomplishment. "To express the author's exact meaning—(1) precisely, (2) with lucidity, (3) worthily, (4) with as close adherence to the original as English idiom allows"—it is a worthy ambition, but not to be attained, nor been attained by any translator yet; and it is "not without a grieved sense of something near akin to profanation" that Mr. Wicksteed confesses to have made the attempt. But assuredly the great Seer will acquit a disciple, who has done more than any Englishman to spread the knowledge and love of his Divine vision, if he has "counter to Dante's own protest striven to expound" in his Northern tongue the beauty which only one conversant with the original can truly appreciate. And the more readily will he be forgiven for the hope he expresses, that "in the great majority of cases, his own work may be taken from the first only as a help to the understanding of Dante's words, not as a substitute for them."

And, indeed, help of any kind, to a comprehension of the "Paradiso," may be welcomed by the mature reader as much as it must be by the beginner; nay, will probably be even more eagerly welcomed, for as we "read and mark and learn and inwardly digest" do we appreciate more and more the profundity of the ideas, and discern difficulties where at first sight all had seemed plain. The "Inferno" is for the greater part easy enough to read and follow; down and down, fascinated by horror, we tread the circles which lead to central Hell, and know the way of hopeless woe, almost as if in some previous existence we had ourselves trodden it. And the "Purgatorio" is common experience to all of us: is not our whole life a painful climbing of the steep hill of penitence, a continual undoing and unlearning, ever accumulating debts paid only with hard labour and much suffering? So—with perhaps waning interest, for the passion and the terror are wanting to thrill our souls—we mount with penitents like ourselves the upward road and mark

* "The Paradiso of Dante Alighieri." Edited, with English version, arguments, and notes, by Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A., and H. Oelsner, M.A. (The English version and arguments by Mr. Wicksteed, the Notes by both Editors, the Text by Mr. Oelsner.) The Temple Classics: Dent and Co. 1s. 6d.

How just God
Decrees our debts be cancelled, by tasks proportioned to our sins.

But "Paradiso" is a land unknown of mortal men, whose

[Sweetest songs
Are those that tell of saddest thought, whose talk is all of change and chance and alternate good and evil. The bliss of safe possession is never ours, and if now and again our earthly way is brightened and glorified awhile, we know it is but as the sunshine which must end with night. Beautiful yet the sunshine, sweet to behold and feel it, but who can conceive of light which never fails and eyes which never weary of it? One fatal drawback thwarts of perfect Bliss our mortal happiness, even at its best—it cannot last. Hence it is that those who have been privileged to see vision or dream dream of Eternity are agreed that it cannot be told again: "words which it is not lawful for man to utter" Paul heard, when "caught up to the third heaven"; and Dante saw "things which whoso descendeth from up there hath nor knowledge nor power to tell again." Yet does he essay to tell it: and no wonder difficulties beset him and overwhelm us "in this last wrestling ground" between common words and sublime ideas: difficulties so great that those of language become of the least, when once the reader has acquired an elementary knowledge of Italian.

And where could we find a kindlier guide than Mr. Wicksteed, or a more competent? For he knows all that is to be known of Dante and his times; yet is not, as too often happens, so cumbered with his learning that he cannot discern between the essential, which must be known in order to comprehend the author's sense, and the accessory which may remain unknown of the multitude of readers without loss.

An Argument, or Summary, precedes each canto. The work is one of great difficulty, though it is apt to appear of small account, and not be made use of as it deserves. The author claims that they have "been prepared with special care," and so much is evident at once to the attentive reader: at the same time more, and ever more, care might be given to the perfecting of it. What, for example, does the sentence mean in the Argument to Canto xxiv., "The divine grace which gives him a foretaste of their feast is their warrant"? Whose warrant? and for what? The comment should be clearer than the text; in this instance it actually creates a new difficulty of interpretation.

But who that has ever tried to explain, has not once and again fallen into the like error, and offered as explanation what itself needed to be explained? It is not enough to ponder every word and select the expression which commends itself as clearest and best; there is required on the part of every teacher the more difficult task to put himself in place of hearer or reader, and conceive how the words will be by him appreciated and understood.

In this age of Progress, the number is ever increasing who look back to the great works of men who, as Ben Jonson wrote of Shakespeare, were not "of an age but for all time." And no one in England has done so much as Mr. Wicksteed to promote the study of this Divine poem, the sole supreme achievement of a thousand years of European effort. For this last gift all lovers of Dante will be grateful to author and publisher, and greedy for more of the same kind. The form and matter, paper, printing, binding, notes, translation, summaries are all delightful. CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION.*

THAT some aspects of the religious life are open to inquiry and study by scientific methods is no new idea. It has been suggested by such writers as the late Mr. George Romanes, and to some extent carried into practice by Mr. Francis Galton and others. Perhaps the most ample study of this kind is that which has been made by Dr. Edwin Starbuck, who has investigated, mainly by the question-answer plan, the growth of the religious consciousness, and has published his results under the title of the "Psychology of Religion." The book has a short Preface from the pen of Professor William James, who tells us that at the outset of the author's inquiry he felt very sceptical as to the possibility of obtaining results of value by the methods adopted, but that after reading the revised proof-sheets of the book he believes that the results amply justify the author's confidence in his methods, and that he feels at present somewhat ashamed at the littleness of his own faith. Objections to the methods of inquiry adopted by Dr. Starbuck are obvious, but it is only fair to say that there are few for which he has not made allowance. At the outset of his inquiry he warns us that his results apply only to American Christians of the present day, who are Protestants, predominantly of the Evangelical sort.

The first section of the book is devoted to a study of Conversion. A few of the results arrived at may be briefly summarised from a great mass of details, supported by numerous diagrams and tables of statistics, which are fully discussed by the author.

In the first place it is noted that conversion is distinctly an adolescent phenomenon. Almost all cases occur between the ages of ten and twenty. But the cases are not uniformly distributed among these years. On the contrary, they may be diagrammatically represented in the form of a curve. The event comes earlier in general among the females, most frequently at thirteen and sixteen. Among the males it occurs most often at seventeen, and immediately before and after that year.

The motives leading to conversion are next discussed and tabulated, and it is shown that altruistic motives play a very small part. Fears appear to be present about fifteen times as often as hope. Only 5 per cent. are altruistic motives; and if we select from these the ones who mention love of God or Christ as leading them to a higher life, we find that they number only 2 per cent. Of the objective forces imitation and social pressure are largest. Hence we begin to see "what a small part rational considerations play in conversion as compared with instinctive."

The experiences preceding conversion are studied, and bear out the idea that conversion is a "struggling away from sin rather than of striving towards righteousness." Proceeding, then, to discuss the meaning of conversion, and considering by the way the part played by the will, by self-surrender, and by faith, the conclusion is reached that spontaneous awakenings are the "fructification of that which has been ripening within the subliminal consciousness." The author illustrates this view of conversion by analogy with other facts of mental assimilation. For example, he quotes Sir William Hamilton's discovery of the method of "Quaternions," because of its similarity in most respects to the mental clarification which announces new religious insight. Hamilton writes:—

To-morrow will be the fifteenth birthday of the "Quaternions." They started into life, or light, full-grown, on Oct. 16, 1843, as I was walking with Lady Hamilton to Dublin, and came up to Broughton Bridge. That is to say, I then and there felt the galvanic current of thought close; and the sparks which fell from it were the fundamental equations i, j, k—exactly such as I have used them ever since. I pulled out on the spot a pocket-book, which still exists, and made an entry, on which, at the very moment, I felt it might be worth my while to expend the labour of at least ten (or it might be fifteen) years to come. But then it is fair to say that was because I felt a problem at that moment solved—an intellectual want relieved—which had haunted me for at least fifteen years before.

By means of such analogies the author illustrates also his conception of the meaning of the self-surrender which often brings peace when the struggling will has failed. In the same persons who strive towards the higher life self-surrender is often necessary before the sense of assurance comes. One of his correspondents writes:—

I had two years of doubts and questionings. It was my disposition to look at everything intellectually. I found I must give myself up into Christ's hands. I stopped thinking about puzzling questions; I had faith in him and found peace.

The personal will must be relaxed partly because it has been exercised not quite in the right direction; partly because it has become necessary to look upon life from a new point of view. "The act of yielding is giving oneself over to the new life, making it the centre of a new personality, and living, from within, the truth of it which had before been viewed objectively." Faith is the next step after self-surrender.

Then faith comes in, which means that the soul is in a receptive attitude, that it is left open so that the new currents of mental activity may flow together into one great stream. One throws oneself completely on the World-will, so that one may become a receiver of its truth and an organ of its activity.

After discussing the biological and sociological aspects of conversion, the author passes on to the consideration of lines of religious growth which do not involve conversion. The records for this study were drawn from a larger number of Christian churches than in the former case, Catholics, Unitarians, and Universalists being well represented. Use was also made of a number of biographies and published records, including Harriet Martineau, Frances Power Cobbe, George Eliot, Tolstoi, Ruskin, Frederick Robertson, Charles Kingsley, and Goethe. It is worth noting that the author, in his first study, set aside "evangelical" biographies as being written too much for edification to be of scientific value.

The author finds that the passage from childhood to adolescence is characterised by a change in the type of religion. The ideas of God, and duty, and religious observance have been external to the child during the earlier years, but now they take root and have a vital significance. The awakening is manifested in various ways, which may be arranged naturally in three groups—a fresh insight involving a distinct rational element; a first-hand perception of right and wrong; and an emotional response. These first awakenings to a vital experience of religious truth may be followed by similar experiences all through the period of adolescence. Some of these experiences are so marked that, had they occurred to those accustomed to make use of evangelical phraseology, they would doubtless have been termed conversions. For this and other reasons the conclusion is reached that "conversion is not a unique experience, but has its correspondences in the common events of religious growth."

If these cases which illustrate the spontaneous awakening of the religious life are found at one extreme not to differ essentially from the milder conversion cases, at the other they merge into a class where the religious life is a process of growth marked by no definite transitions. This form of development is illustrated by the case of Dr. E. E. Hale, who writes:—

> Any man has an advantage who is born, as I was, into a family where the religion is simple and rational; who is trained in the theory of such a religion so that he never knows, for an hour, what these religious or irreligious struggles are. I always knew God loved me, and I was always grateful to Him for the world He placed me in. I always liked to tell Him so, and was always glad to receive His suggestions to me.

Dr. Starbuck's whole work may be regarded as a study of certain aspects of adolescence, and we believe that no small part of the value of the book will be found in the educational hints which are scattered through its pages, and to which the author is led by the study of his materials. Especially will those whose duty it is wisely to guide the religious growth of young people find much of value in a careful study of its pages. It is only possible here to refer to a few points of interest.

The ideal of gradual religious growth, represented in the case of Dr. Hale already quoted, would probably be accepted in most of our churches as the normal one. The author regards such an ideal as a very high one well worth striving after, and discusses at considerable length the conditions which seem to conduce to its attainment. Of these, religious surroundings in childhood play a very important part, as is illustrated by statistics and extracts from the replies of his correspondents. The influences of home were most frequently mentioned: "I had God-fearing parents, and was surrounded by all the influences which go to make godly character. From infancy I was taught to believe that I belonged to the Saviour, and that he loved me." If from the earliest years the child drinks in the conception that religion is a life of love and helpfulness and not a body of doctrines, it will go far towards obviating the necessity of learning it as a painful lesson.

Another condition is, That children be kept reasonably free from dogmas which they are incapable of assimilating.

Another cause that facilitates harmonious growth is that the needs of the child be carefully met at every point of its development; an important point which the author illustrates in a very interesting way.

It is somewhat disappointing to find that in Dr. Starbuck's opinion this ideal must at present remain an ideal for the majority of human beings.

We have to face the fact that at the present time and with the conditions under which we live, growth usually does not come in that way; and if we appreciate only a fraction of the difficulties in passing from childhood to maturity, we shall see that such a course is well-nigh impossible.

If this be so it may partly explain the complaint occasionally heard among us of the difficulty of retaining our elder scholars as Church members. We have kept before us an ideal of religious growth, lofty and beautiful indeed, but attainable only by the few. We have failed sufficiently to realise what Dr. Starbuck clearly shows, that there are different lines of religious growth which are naturally followed by different persons all travelling towards the same goal. These different ideals are recognised by different Churches, and held up as the true means of entering the spiritual life. Nevertheless, the persons in these Churches are scattered among the different groups, and tend to follow the laws written in their own beings, rather than the ideal held up by their Churches. A wise Church would recognise these different tendencies and attempt to meet them.

We have been able to touch upon only a few features of what we regard as in many ways a remarkable book. Dr. Starbuck has carried out an extremely difficult and laborious task, with great energy and rare broadmindedness, and marshals his conclusions with a sweet reasonableness which carries the reader pleasantly through a rather alarming series of statistical tables, curves, and diagrams. These conclusions are not likely to be grateful to whose who can find evidence of God only in the supernatural, but may be accepted as a real contribution to religious knowledge by all who rejoice to believe that we live in a lawful universe whose Author everywhere is not the author of confusion but of peace. Whether regarded as a contribution to science or to religion, the work is welcome. Here we would recommend it also as an aid to the study of spiritual diagnosis and treatment.

W. B. DRUMMOND.

THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS.

SIR,—In my first letter I gave my reasons for considering sin, not as a primary but a secondary fact of religious experience; the primary fact being the Ideal of Righteousness, which leads us up to faith in the Fatherhood of God.

The next question which presents itself in this inquiry relative to forgiveness is the question of the nature of sin itself.

Mr. Bennett waives this preliminary question. "What, then, is sin?" he asks. But he goes on to say: "No attempt is made here to give an exhaustive answer to so profound a question. What sin is in itself, as an objective fact apart from the conviction of sin, lies outside the scope of the present inquiry." But how is it possible to know what forgiveness means, if we have not a clear notion of the thing which is to be forgiven?

Sin is a special aspect of evil. Evil itself I should define as all that falls below the ideal perfection and happiness of man, both in the species and in the individual. To be more precise, as perfect knowledge, perfect happiness, perfect love, perfect beauty are the Ideal, we look upon ignorance, suffering, unkindness, ugliness as evil. But we know that a great deal of evil is unavoidable; we may even ask ourselves if some measure of evil, under the shape of imperfection, will not always necessarily attach itself to us as finite beings, and whether the only possible means of the total disappearance of evil is not the absorption of the finite in the Infinite, "God all in all."

Now, the evil that is unavoidable we do not call sin. A sacerdotalist and an atheist who preach fatal errors mistaking them for truth, an ascetic who ruins his health by foolish penances and fasts, a madman who kills his wife or child fall into evil but do not commit sin.

What, therefore, is sin? It is a conscious and voluntary falling below the Ideal. A man must see, know, and, in some measure, love the Ideal for him to be able to commit sin, as distinguished from evil. He must see and know the Ideal: "If ye were blind, ye would have no sin." "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin." "I had not known sin except through the law." I think we would all agree not to call a man sinful who had no knowledge of right.

But, moreover, to be able to commit sin, a man must first possess some measure of love for the Ideal. Imagine a man whose whole affections were completely inclined to evil, a man in whose nature no other feeling existed but the love of evil, that man might appear to us as repulsive as the most cruel beast of prey; but he could not be sinful. How could he help himself? What room would there be in his person for the exercise of will? There can be no exercise of will without an alternative, without a deliberation concerning the two things offered, and the two desires awakened, and a determination in favour of one or the other. There can be no exercise of will without a temptation, a struggle; and how can man struggle morally if he be not placed between the enticement of evil and the affection for the right? A man who sins must, therefore, be a man who having the power to deliberate between those two affections throws the decisive weight of his will into the scale of evil desire.

A man such as I have imagined, a man with none but evil affections, might be brought to exercise his will by terror, by the threat of some dire punishment; but a man wavering simply between a strong desire and a great fear would be outside the pale of religion and ethics; no moral principle would help to determine his choice.

It might be said that an alternative is presented by the knowledge of right opposing the love of evil. Sinners are in reality often spoken of as knowing the right and yet loving evil, as if on one side there were nothing but knowledge. But that is a pyschological mistake, proceeding from an imperfect analysis of spiritual phenomena. As all our motive power resides in affections and desires, a man who had nothing but a pure intellectual knowledge of the right could not possibly act, could not resist the love of evil, and therefore could not possibly be guilty of wilful sin. Besides which, it appears to me, that no one can know and declare things to be right and good without showing ipso facto that he approves them, and what is such an approval but an incipient affection?

In that remarkable Seventh Chapter of Romans, so ardently discussed between Calvinists and Arminians, does not St. Paul clearly express the thought which I am contending for, that sin only appears in the man who consents unto the law that it is good. "I delight in the law of God after the inward man: but I see a different law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity under the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am!" If this wretched man feels himself so sinful, is it not just because of his love for the law of God, though that love be not strong enough yet to overcome the desire of evil?

My readers will easily perceive that the distinction between evil and sin involves a distinction between the sense of evil and the conviction of sin. When St. Paul was a young man and a zealous Pharisee, he thought it his duty to harass and slaughter the early Christians; but later, when Christ was revealed in him as the Son of God, the thought of the persecuting period was very grievous to him. "I was before a blasphemer, a persecutor and injurious; howbeit I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief." Whoever wrote those words, they no doubt expressed Paul's feelings. The memory of the sad mistake he had made oppressed him: it was a sense of evil, but not a convition of sin, because the mistake was committed in all sincerity: "I did it ignorantly in unbelief." Most of us, if we have progressed much in spiritual life, will remember in the past mistakes which we may deeply regret as evil, but not repent of as sins, because they were not on our part a conscious and voluntary falling below our Ideal: we were ignorant and our ideal was imperfect.

In a third letter, I will endeavour to point out what conclusions are to be drawn from the above view of sin with regard to the forgiveness of sins.

OBITUARY.

HAMILTON JAMES BEGG.

Mr. H. J. Begg, who died on the 24th ult., was the oldest member of the Peckham Church, with which he had been connected from its origin in Walworth in 1867. He was an active officer of the church till the breakdown of his health about two years ago, and attended its services until a comparatively recent date whenever his strength permitted. He was a man of wide knowledge and an admirable speaker. The esteem in which he was held was attested by the large and representative gathering at his funeral in the Forest Hill cemetery on Saturday last, when the religious service was conducted by his intimate friend, the Rev. G. Carter. Among those present were the Chairman, Secretary, and many of the members of the London Association of Correctors of the Press (of which the deceased was one time secretary), members of the Avondale-road Church, and a wide circle of private friends. In the address at the graveside, Mr. Carter alluded to his friend as a man who adorned an honourable profession by his practice; as an independent thinker who was tolerant of the opinions of others; and as a preacher of righteousness in his loyalty to duty, in his manly advocacy of the right and true, and his patient endurance of suffering. The influence of such a man must still live on in the lives of those who knew him.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The other evening I was reading a book which used to delight me as a child, and delights me still—"Plutarch's Lives."

Plutarch, as some of you know, was what we call a literary man, who lived in a little town in Greece, 1800 years ago. To be exact, between the years 45 and 120 of our era. And he wrote the lives of the most famous men of the past, as they had come to him; and these lives are a treasury of the memorable things said and done by these great men, and wherever you open them, you are sure to find some interesting story or saying. It has sometimes pleased me to think that during the years Plutarch, in his country home, was gathering and writing down these anecdotes and sayings of famous Greeks and Romans, there was being gathered and set down the story of the life of one greater than any of these, of whom Plutarch never heard—which we have in our four Gospels.

The story I was reading from Plutarch was the Life of Pyrrhus. Pyrrhus was a young Greek prince, who had a life full of adventure and war. He was driven away from the kingdom, which should have been his when he was a baby, and when he grew up he had much struggle to win it back. But in the course of these struggles he got the reputation of being a most brave and able soldier, and even—so some said—of being the greatest general of his day.

At one time the people of Tarentum, a city of Italy, were carrying on a war with the people of Rome. Things were not going well with them, and they bethought them of Pyrrhus. If they could only get him to come and help them. Pyrrhus—who when he had no special fighting for himself to do was only too glad to take up fighting for other people—came at once at their call, with such forces as he could get together, and with him came a friend of his, named Cineas; a wise and thoughtful man, who, Pyrrhus used to say, had gained him more cities by his persuasions than he had ever won for himself by fighting.

It is a little talk between these two friends I want to tell you of.

"When we have got through with this business, Pyrrhus, and have really beaten the Romans," said Cineas, "shall you be ready to go home?"

"Go home," said Pyrrhus; "no, indeed, we shall only have begun. When we have beaten the Romans—who are the bravest soldiers in Italy—and have taken Rome, we shall overrun the whole country, and make ourselves masters of it."

"And shall you be satisfied then?" asked Cineas.

"Hardly," said Pyrrhus. "Just to the south lies the great and fertile island of Sicily. They have just driven away the only really able man among them, and there is no one to lead them but a lot of fluent talkers, who know nothing about affairs. It will be a very easy matter to subdue Sicily."

"So it would seem," said Cineas. And then after thinking a while: "After conquering Sicily, you will be contented?"

"Well," said Pyrrhus, laughing, "that does not follow. When we have got as far as Sicily, what is to hinder our crossing over to Africa, and conquering all those fine provinces which are lying just now rather at loose ends? Isn't that a good idea, my dear Cineas?"

"Yes," said Cineas, "and when you have done all this you will then, I suppose, be strong enough to go back to Greece, and settle yourself there securely?"

"Certainly," said Pyrrhus, "that is what we will do."

"But what, my dear Pyrrhus," said Cineas, "are we to do then?"

"Oh," said Cineas, "do then? Why then we will invite our friends, and entertain them, and enjoy ourselves."

Then said Cineas, "But if the best thing we can do at last is to sit down and enjoy our friends' society, what hinders us from doing that now? Here is entertainment sufficient for us and them, and why should you run all these risks, and face all these dangers, and inflict all this harm, in order to do by-and-by what you might just as well do now?"

It is said that Pyrrhus thought this over a great deal, but wise counsel seldom prevails over a man's natural inclination. Pyrrhus went on fighting, and in five or six years after this, before he had carried out half his fine plans, he was killed himself.

But perhaps you will remember this word of Cineas, "Why shouldn't I do it now?"

That which I mean to do or to be sometime, that which I know I ought to do, that which I intend to do by-and-by, after I have done this or that which I am now taken up with, that which I am putting off, and putting off, knowing all the while it has to come—Why shouldn't I do it now?

A HELPFUL INTERPRETER.

THE need of a reliable and really helpful commentary on the New Testament, produced in freedom from the traditions of dogmatic orthodoxy, has long been felt by members of our own religious community and in a wider circle, and we may therefore trust that a very cordial welcome is already assured to the series of "International Handbooks to the New Testament," edited by Dr. ORELLO CONE, which is in course of publication, by Messrs. PUTNAM, of New York. The purpose of the Handbooks, it is said in the editor's Preface to the whole work, is to meet the wants of the general reader, and at the same time to present the results of the latest scholarship and of the most thorough critical investigation. There are to be four volumes, covering the whole of the New Testament, and the first volume to be issued, which is now before us, is by Dr. DRUMMOND, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, and deals with the Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Corinthians, Galatians, Romans, and Philippians.*

Readers who are familiar with Dr. DRUMMOND'S Hibbert Lectures, and we may add, with his little books on the Epistle to the Galatians and "The Pauline Benediction," will naturally turn with the keenest expectation to this Commentary, and will find abundant reason for thankfulness that it has been published. If they meet with any disappointment, it will be chiefly on the ground of hunger for more, and because within the limits laid down for the Commentary, in a volume of less than four hundred by no means crowded pages, it was inevitable that there should be questions of the deepest interest raised by the Epistles, in connection both with the life and teaching of the great Apostle, which are only briefly touched upon, with an indication of the conclusions to which Dr. DRUMMOND has been led, but without further elucidation. At the same time throughout the Commentary there are somewhat fuller notes introduced in small type, expounding such essential points as the meaning of grace, the "saints," faith, redemption, which may be passed over by readers who do not wish to grapple with them, but the greater part of which is yet within the grasp of those who have no knowledge of Greek; these notes add considerably to the completeness of the work. Of his own sense of its limitations the author speaks with the utmost modesty; but readers who faithfully use this Commentary, which is based on the text of the English Revised Version, will have a growing sense of indebtedness to their guide as they become more familiar with the profound and ardent thought of the Apostle, and with the beautiful spirit of his interpreter.

There are two kinds of difficulty to be met in dealing with the Epistles, if they are to yield their full result of religious inspiration. What was merely temporary in the Apostle's forms of thought, and in his beliefs, which experience has proved to have been mistaken, has to be separated from what is of permanent spiritual significance; and later doctrines of the Christian Church, in what is generally known as the Evangelical scheme of salvation, which is supposed to be derived mainly from the teaching of St. PAUL, have to be prevented from colouring our interpretation of the Apostle's language with a meaning which was not his own, that we may get at what was actually in his mind. The manner in which Dr. DRUMMOND meets such difficulties will best be seen by one or two examples.

St. PAUL, it seems, expected in his own life-time the second coming of CHRIST, in the clouds of glory. The belief, more crudely expressed in the Epistles to the Thessalonians, is found also in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, where there is an allusion to the survival of the writer himself with others at the second coming, and to the "last trumpet," which shall summon the dead to rise. On this Dr. DRUMMOND remarks:—

> Although we may wish that our Apostle had been infallible, and had not been so possessed with an idea which to us must appear groundless, and indicative of a certain degree of blind enthusiasm, we cannot regard the enunciation of this belief as any argument against the genuineness of the writing in which it occurs. We must learn to accept the revelations of God upon His own conditions. We say we must have something infallible, or we will recognise nothing Divine about it; He gives us truth hemmed in by human limitation, and leaves something to our own experience and spiritual wisdom. Paul himself said that we have our treasure in earthen vessels, and that knowledge must pass away; but that is a truth which men are always unwilling to accept.

And again, having referred to ALFORD'S insistence that as GOD speaks to us in the Bible, we must hear His voice, if at all, in passages which treat so confidently of futurity:—

> The answer, however little it is seen through the veil which lies upon the heart of Christendom, is almost too obvious—in 1 Corinthians xiii., in Romans xii., in the Beatitudes, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, and numerous other passages which find an answer in the conscience and the heart. It is assumed that the inspiration of Apostles can have no analogy in us, and that, therefore, we must seek it most in those things which to us are impenetrable mystery, while the oracles of the Holy Spirit in consecrated souls are to be set aside as common things, which bear no witness to the operation of God. Thus the grandest and clearest truths of the Gospel are neglected as within the range of uninspired humanity, and men have sought for God where least He is to be found, amid fantastic interpretations and apocalyptic dreams.

There are fantastic interpretations in other passages of PAUL'S arguments; but with such guidance as Dr. DRUMMOND gives, it is not difficult to trace them to their natural source, and to separate from these the vital religious truth. Examples of a careful interpretation of the Apostle's thought, as guarded against the colouring of later dogmatic beliefs, will be found in the famous passage in Philippians, where Christ is spoken of as "in the form of GOD," in the comment on Romans ix. 5, and on those passages which seem to imply the personal pre-existence of Christ.

In the commentary on Romans, Dr. DRUMMOND is at the heart of the Apostle's faith in the new spiritual life, and it is here especially, while receiving much invaluable help, that we are led to hope for something more than the limits of this work allow. It is here that the greatest care is required, in view of the popular doctrines of salvation and the blood of Christ, to obtain a clear understanding of the Apostle's actual teaching. An example of the healthy tone of Dr. DRUMMOND'S interpretation will be found in the following comment on the phrase "reconciled to GOD through the death of His Son":—

> That complete self-sacrifice of love was the means by which men's hearts were touched. If, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, the offender had not wished or had not dared to return home, and if the elder son, knowing his father's love, had gone to seek him, and, having entreated him to come back, had been murdered by the youth's dissolute friends; if, further, the prodigal had been overcome by this proof of affection, and sought once more his father's home, might he not have said that he had been reconciled by his brother's death, that his redemption from sin had been at the cost of his brother's blood, and that the love which had given up so much would give all else that was needful? Such phrases as we have here sound harsh and strange when we treat them as some theological mystery, but become intelligible as soon as we turn to the natural springs of gratitude and affection.

And as a last quotation we will add the following passage, referring to the gift of speaking with tongues, which leads up to a comment on 1 Corinthians xiii. :—

In spiritual as in physical things men are too apt to prefer fireworks to the everlasting stars, and to see God in what is exceptional and startling, rather than in the calm and abiding presence of His eternal Spirit. This is a great danger in times of religious excitement; and nothing shows the grandeur of Paul's mind more clearly than the fact that, while he had a wonderful range of gifts, and spake with tongues more than they all (xiv. 18), he used them only to minister to what was higher and more enduring, and clearly perceived that the life of Christ within the heart, which belonged to every disciple, was the purest gift of the Spirit.

These passages will show something of the scope of Dr. Drummond's Commentary, which, while not overweighted with a mass of textual criticism, will be found, we believe, just what is wanted to make the Epistles intelligible to the reader, not as matters merely of antiquarian interest, but as the letters of a living man, instinct with affections and ardent religious purpose, rich in lessons of wisdom for the present as for his own day. For serious study in elder classes, in Reading circles, and in Ministers' Congregational classes, as well as for individual readers of St. Paul, this new Commentary is to be very warmly commended.

HOW IT MIGHT BE.

"But the vortex-atom hypothesis and Dr. Larmor's strain-atom hypothesis both seem to indicate that we are moving in the direction of the abolition of the distinction between matter and ether, that we shall come to regard the luminiferous medium, not as an attenuated substance here and there encumbered with detached blocks—the molecules of matter—but as something which in certain places exhibits modifications which we term matter. Or starting rather from matter, we may come to think of matter as no longer consisting of separated granules, but as a continuum with properties grouped around the centres, which we regard as atoms or molecules."—Professor Poynting, Address, British Association, 1899.

"Our bodily senses do but admit us to a perception of the outermost film of the unfathomable reality. With acuter senses, a richer world would at once open before our astonished vision; and it is not at all improbable that there exist different aspects of reality from those which we now perceive, to which new senses of a more subtile nature may give our spirits access. . . . We need not go in imagination into remote regions of space to find our heaven or hell: there are depths of being immediately around and within us, which open limitless possibilities as to the 'where' and 'how' of the departed spirit's existence."—Professor Upton, Hibbert Lectures, 1893.

The day had been very sultry, and had seemed very long, as all days then did to me. The evening sun was casting lengthening shadows across the sward as I emerged from the forest into a little glade, surrounded on all sides by spreading oaks and beeches, with here and there a clump of sombre pines. In the middle stood a fountain, which from a central shaft threw a lofty jet of water into the still and heavy air; breaking the silence by a monotonous pattering sound as, separating into thousands of drops, it fell back into the marble basin. In the woods was no movement, no sound or sign of life. Weary in body and in soul, I threw myself upon the grass by the fountain's side—weary in soul, for the heaviest loss had recently been mine. One by whose side I had thought to spend my life, and by whose side only life seemed worth having, had been suddenly taken from me, leaving me face to face with long years of loneliness, and with no certain hope of any reunion to follow. I believed in God indeed, vaguely, being unable to ignore the evidences of Him in the world about me. I knew that if He chose it must be in his power to satisfy in some way the cravings of frustrated love, yet I saw no reason why He should do so, why, having given so much, He should still give more. I could think of no place in the universe where that meeting might be; could conceive of no form or manner in which that tender love could again embody itself or find expression. No, it was over for her; it would be over for me too some day, and the sooner that day should come the better. Was not that fountain a fit emblem of all life? Tossed for a moment into the sunlight and free air; breaking for an instant into individuality of being, we have scarce time to recognise ourselves before, like the drops of water, we fall back into the general mass, and are hurried away by dark channels underground—the stuff of which we are made, body and soul alike—to form material in new combinations for some fresh manifestation of the eternal energy of God.

So thinking, I fell asleep. As I slept it seemed to me that I still lay beside the fountain, but that all else was gone. Below me nothing, above me nothing, on no side of me anything save the fountain, which played on noiselessly, unfed from any source, miraculously suspended there in space. Even its marble basin and central stem were gone. All was water, which held its place and directed its course aright without any external aid. The space around me was filled with pale cold light, through which I seemed able to gaze into unfathomable depths, ever further and further, yet finding no object on which to rest my aching eyes, till only with a great effort could I withdraw them to look again upon the wonder at my side. An awful sense of solitude grew upon me as I lay there awestruck and motionless. Then, when the pain of it had grown almost beyond my power to bear, there came a voice, which seemed indeed not to break the silence, but to make itself heard by me without the aid of sound.

"Beholdest thou here thy emblem of Creation?"

"Yea, Lord," I answered, "I behold the vision."

"Why callest thou it a vision? Put forth thy hand."

I stretched out my hand. A drop from the fountain fell upon it. I felt it and it was wet.

"Is not this," said the voice, "what thou callest real; that which thy body can touch and feel? Put forth thy hand again."

Again I stretched out my arm. The water seemed to fall upon my hand, but I felt nothing, and no mark of it was left. Then said the voice: "Behold the water is no less real, but thy senses can no longer perceive it as before. Think not that thy senses are able to perceive all that is real."

"Lord," I replied, "the fountain hath no source; no water floweth to it.'

"It hath the source which all things have. It hath its source in me. Behold it. See'st thou in it naught save the moving water?"

And I answered: "Lord, I see that in it is power, which seems to be its own, and that it hath purpose in it, rising and falling ever in the same ways."

"My purpose thou beholdest and my power. The light which spreads illimitably around is my life. But speak the thought which troubles thee."

"Lord," I cried, "if the fountain be real water, how cometh it in empty space? How hath it arisen out of nothing?"

"No space is empty," said the voice; "there is no meaning in thy word 'nothing'; for I am everywhere, and everywhere is that which my power and my purpose mould into endless forms of being. They are of myself, but not all myself, and some only thy mortal eyes can see. Look again upon the fountain."

I looked and saw that the jet of water was slowly sinking. Lower and lower it became, until at last it was not, and there lay before me for an instant a still flat pool. For an instant only, and then it seemed to gather itself up into a sphere, which, expanding on every side, became like a cloud. And the cloud encompassed me, and grew thinner and thinner, until I could perceive it no longer, and it seemed I was alone in space.

Then the voice said: "The fountain is no more, but that which was the fountain is lost only to thine eyes. Believest thou not that the power which has dissolved can again create it?"

And I cried: "Lord, I believe;" and as I spoke the fountain was again by my side. A gladness came over me that I was not utterly alone, and with it came courage to speak the trouble which lingered in my mind.

"Lord, I perceive that out of something, which I see not, thou art for ever creating the things which I behold; but also that thou destroyest that which thou hast made. The drops of water rise in their determined courses. They fall back into the basin and are no more."

Then said the voice: "Look more closely upon the fountain."

I looked again and saw in it a change. I saw that as some of the drops separated themselves from the central mass, there appeared within them a tiny point of light, which seemed to grow in brilliancy and was as if the pale light that flowed around concentrated itself there. And these drops followed not in their paths the same order as the others, but deviated each into a different way. It seemed as though within each were some separate power, choosing its own course. Often they clashed together and often fell in unharmonious lines and curves, so that the symmetry and beauty of the whole were sorely marred. Some lingered longer in the air than others, but in the end all fell into the basin and were lost.

"Lord," I said, "it seems as if some other powers than thine were working now."

"Into these drops," came the reply, "I have poured more of my life, and with it a portion of my power and will. To them a measure of freedom has been given. Now is the fountain a better emblem to thee of my work."

Then I cried: "Lord, why sufferest thou that thus these mar the beauty of thy work? Were it not better that they had no freedom?"

"I will that they should learn so to love this beauty that they shall freely harmonise their work with mine, and to that end see now what further gift I give, and how a soul is born within them."

And lo! a beam of rosy light, that shot across the pale regions of space and fell upon the fountain and tinted it with soft colour. It sank into those wayward drops ever more and more, until each seemed as though it ensphered a glowing heart.

"This," said the voice, "is my love. Behold its work."

And I saw that slowly the confusion ceased. The glowing drops no longer warred aimlessly against one another. Each still took its individual course. It was not the old symmetry that returned, but a new, more beautiful and more wonderful harmony, until at last a whole, ever varying, but ever more perfect than before, was before me.

"Such," said the voice, "is the creation as it is to be."

But the trouble was upon me still, and I cried: "To what end is this new beauty? All still fall into the basin and are lost. Is it to please thyself only, Lord, that thou causest this wonder to be?" Then I hid my face, trembling for the boldness of my speech. For a while there was silence, and I thought: "Perchance he will annihilate me now. It is his right, if so he will." Then came the voice more gently than before: "I have bound myself by Law and the drops must fall. I have bound myself by Love, and the soul that loves shall live, for in it is that which worketh for eternal harmony and perfect beauty. Look thou again."

I looked again and saw now that as each drop in which the light had lodged itself fell into the basin the glowing point that was in it was not extinguished, but shone still in the water, one amid a myriad glowing points.

Then I said: "I see, indeed, that the light endures for a while though the drop be gone, but it lives not apart from that of which the water is made. If thou use that in some new creation, surely, Lord, then the light is also lost."

"The basin of creation has no bounds," replied the voice, "nor in my hands doth that with which I work serve one purpose only at one time. That which I use to form the body of this water, visible to thee, I can also use to form the body of other things which thy mortal senses cannot perceive."

The scene was changed; the fountain vanished. I was still floating in space, but below me at a vast distance lay the earth. Above me was the sun; around me the vast army of the stars. The something in which I lay became dimly visible and palpable to me, and seemed to be in incessant motion. From out the sun and stars I saw countless waves proceeding at enormous speeds. They flowed on in every direction, crossing and passing, yet not destroying, one another, and some of them breaking softly upon me.

"Behold," said the voice, "how I use that with which I work to form a multitude of these waves at once."

Again a change. It seemed that my sight grew more keen and I perceived an added series of waves flowing upon me, and past me from the sun. And some of these broke not upon me but passed through me and were in me, waves of the inmost stuff of which my body was made.

Again came the voice: "Behold how that of which thine own body is made serves also to give form and expression to something other than thou."

Then came another change. Once more I was lying in the glade, between the trees and by the fountain's side. I looked around me and beheld the grass, the water, and the flowers. I saw how the tree tops were gently swaying in the evening breeze and felt it playing upon my face. But not only did I see and feel these things—I saw into them and perceived what they really were. I saw that one and all they, like my own body, were but modifications of that primal stuff whereof all things are made—modifications and appearances arising from changing movements and combinations of movements in it. As I gazed, other more rapid and subtile movements and combinations became dimly apparent to me, and with them new appearances arose, faint at first, but growing more and more distinct; not effacing the others, but coexisting with, traversing and intersecting them. Two worlds indeed seemed to be before my eyes at the same time. And as these fresh appearances grew more clear, I marked that some of them were wholly new and strange to me, forms such as I had never seen, and of whose meaning and purpose I could form no idea. Some seemed to be at rest, and some to be in motion; but with others it was not so, and I saw that they were like unto men and women, over whom some great change had come. As I gazed, one of these fair forms drew near to me and stood over me. Then again a great trembling came upon me, for I perceived that it was my beloved. In vain I strove to rise and speak, torn by an agony of desire—in vain, for all power of motion was gone from me. I could but gaze, lost in an overpowering wonder and longing, until, in a whisper faint as the gentlest breeze, came the words, "Not yet, not yet; be comforted and wait."

Then I awoke and peace was in my heart, for I knew that now I had seen as in a glass darkly, but that some day I should indeed see face to face; and I cried aloud: "Lord, I believe that those who love shall live."

As from a vast distance there seemed to come a solemn answer: "There is some love in every child of mine." ZETA.

THE LONDON BAZAAR.

THE great Bazaar for which preparations have so long been made in connection with the jubilee of the London District Unitarian Society was held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of this week at the King's Hall, Holborn, while festivities in connection with it have been continued up to the end of the week.

We shall conclude that all who are interested in the workers and their work either have or will become possessed of the "Book of the Bazaar," and shall, therefore, not repeat here the information it contains as to the stalls and their attendants and the members of the various committees. The book, as has been already pointed out in these columns, is much more than a mere directory to the Bazaar, and the account of "London Unitarians and the Churches where they Worship," with a large number of illustrations both of buildings and of men, is of much more than passing interest.

In the King's Hall itself there were fifteen stalls, including the Manchester and the Welsh stalls, at the latter of which the attendants were in national costume. In the vestibule were four other stalls, including the Denton hats and country goods, while the art galleries were literally the galleries on each side of the hall. In the Grand Master's Room there was a most interesting exhibition of samplers, art needlework, &c.; in the Duke's Room demonstrations of wireless telegraphy and the X-rays, &c., were given under the direction of Mr. T. Tremain, and in another room skilful artists executed "Ten-minutes' Sketch Portraits," which were the subject of much curiosity and admiration. In the hall itself the Blue Hungarian band performed, while the special entertainments were held in the Crown Room. These were of great variety, including a pretty "May-day Pastoral," arranged by Mr. Savage Cooper; some scenes from Jane Austen's novels, arranged by Mr. Macrae Moir, and most admirably rendered; a very amusing rendering of Sheridan's "Critic," under the direction of Mr. Herbert Lawford; dramatic sketches, arranged by Miss K. Goddard; and variety entertainments, arranged by Mr. J. A. Whitehead. Flowers were everywhere in evidence, and the abundance of beautiful, curious and useful goods made an almost overwhelming impression in the crowded hall. The final result of the Bazaar we cannot announce this week, but it was very satisfactory to learn at the opening that donations already amounted to over £10,000 of the £12,000 aimed at, and we understand that the receipts on the first two days were close upon £2,000. The expenses will of course have been heavy, but there seems every prospect of the end being attained.

TUESDAY.

The Bazaar was opened on Tuesday by Lady Brunner, the chair being taken by Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. The speakers occupied the gallery at the end of the hall, looking down on the animated scene below.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER, in opening the proceedings, expressed his pleasure in performing the duty allotted to him, and in seeing so many friendly and familiar faces before him. He was, he said, in the very heartiest sympathy with the objects they had in view in the work which culminated on that day. He had opened many bazaars, and not a few connected with the religious body to whose interest he had been devoted his life long. And there, in the centre of English Unitarian Christianity, he found himself as much at home as in any part of the country. He had first to call on Dr. Brooke Herford, who would kindly take the place of Dr. Blake Odgers, who was to have made a statement as to the objects of the Bazaar, but was unfortunately prevented by professional duties from being present.

Dr. BROOKE HERFORD expressed the regret they all felt at Dr. Blake Odgers's unavoidable absence, and proceeded to speak of the great need the work of their London churches had of better support. They were all familiar with the particulars of the appeal which had been made for a Permanent Building Fund, to aid in the extension of their work, and for the strengthening of their present churches. The appeal for donations had not at once met with the response they had hoped for, and the Bazaar movement had sprung into existence, stimulated by the earlier experience of Manchester, and the vigorous initiative of Dr. and Mrs. Odgers, who had so nobly done their part throughout the whole of the work. Already they had received in donations over £10,000, and they had good hope of completing the amount aimed at by the Bazaar. He concluded by offering to Lady Brunner, on behalf of the Committee, a copy of the "Book of the Bazaar."

Lady BRUNNER, who had also been presented with a beautiful bouquet, then declared the Bazaar open, with cordial good wishes for its success.

Sir JAMES KITSON, Bart., M.P., in proposing a vote of thanks to Lady Brunner, said that he might claim to be an old London Unitarian, for it had been his privilege to sit under Dr. Hutton at Carter-lane Chapel and afterwards to be a seat-holder at Little Portland-street under Mr. Tagart. He was delighted to have that opportunity of acknowledging with gratitude his good fortune in being associated in his youth with those noble men, and of saying how much he had owed to their teaching in the active life he had lived. He was very glad to take that little part in the proceedings of the day. He did not think they should have any difficulty in obtaining the amount they asked for. On the previous Saturday he had presided at the opening of a Baptist Chapel in his constituency in Yorkshire, in a small hamlet on a Yorkshire hill. The chapel cost £4,000, towards which, in the last five years, the people themselves, who were workers in the mills, had raised £2,700. He asked whether what was required of them was commensurable with the sacrifices of those hard-working people? They knew how much Sir John and Lady Brunner had done to assist their cause and all noble causes out of the ample resources at their command, and he had great pleasure in proposing the vote of thanks to Lady Brunner.

The vote was at once carried by acclamation, and was acknowledged by Lady Brunner and by Sir John, who added that if he were to follow Sir James Kitson's line of thought, he should make as full and grateful acknowledgment to the Unitarian teachers he had known in his youth.

The opening proceedings being over, the band began their programme with "God save the Queen," and the traffic of the Bazaar commenced.

WEDNESDAY.

On Wednesday the Bazaar was opened by Lady Durning-Lawrence.

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., presided, and began with the remark that it was May 2, and that on May 2, 1850, a meeting had been held at Radley's Hotel, said to have been called by some of the younger men among the London Unitarians, and the London District Unitarian Society had been founded. That was, therefore, the jubilee day of their society. The first president was Mr. Alderman Lawrence, and the first treasurer Mr. Elhanan Bicknell, while among the vice-presidents were a number of well-known laymen and the Revs. Dr. Hutton, T. Madge and E. Tagart. Among those present at the first meeting were their friends Mr. S. S. Tayler and Mr. Joseph Preston, who were with them on that occasion. The society had done good honest work in making known in that great city their clear and simple faith. During the last twenty years ten new chapels had been built; but the need of more funds was always pressing upon them, and they also felt that they had not done their duty to the growing city; but that in many new districts new chapels ought to be built. Hence that movement, in which they had received such abundant help, notably from friends in Manchester and from Wales.

Lady DURNING-LAWRENCE, in declaring the Bazaar open on the second day, expressed the wish, for the sake of Unitarianism and for the sake of the honoured names they had heard that day, that it might be abundantly successful, and that the result of their work might be to make Unitarians a strong and useful body.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER proposed a vote of thanks to Lady Durning-Lawrence, which was carried by acclamation.

Sir EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE, Bart., M.P., in responding on behalf of Lady Lawrence, said that when the Chairman spoke of fifty years ago and the foundation of their Society, he remembered that as a boy he had been present at the meeting, and it was a great pride and pleasure to him that on that day his wife had been asked to open the Bazaar.

THURSDAY.

On the third day the Bazaar was opened by Mrs. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. David Martineau presiding.

MRS. NETTLEFOLD, in declaring the Bazaar open on the final day, referred to the progress of which signs could be seen not only among Unitarians, but on all sides of liberal and enlightened views of Christianity. Within her own memory the number of their chapels in London had been greatly increased, and they looked to the Permanent Fund they were forming, to secure a further increase. There were large numbers of persons drifting about amidst a whole sea of churches and chapels, who yet could find no true spiritual home; and they hoped to provide for such people chapels where they could cast the anchor of their faith. That was the last day of the Bazaar, their last chance to literally "turn the common dust of servile opportunity to gold." She trusted that the last day would be the best day of the Bazaar, and she was confident that they would do their best to make it so.

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS, in proposing a vote of thanks to Mrs. Nettlefold, said that on the first day they had done fairly well, and also on the second day, and if now they did as well they would gain the object they had in view. But even if the Bazaar as a financial effort had been a complete failure it would have been a great good. The good work thrown into it, the enthusiasm, the way in which all had worked together, even those who at first had been unwilling and yet had been drawn in to work heartily with the rest, had been a distinct gain.

Mr. NETTLEFOLD, in responding, made a forcible and humorous appeal to the visitors as the attacking party to dismantle all the stalls. It was their bounden duty on that last day to clear them out.

Operations then proceeded, and we have every reason to believe that the Bazaar was brought to a most satisfactory conclusion.

IN THE ACADEMY.

A FIRST glimpse at the Royal Academy Exhibition, which opens to the public on Monday, reveals some astonishing pictures, one or two really overpowering in their size, and great stretches of dreary waste. The familiar landscapes are there, Mac Whirter and Peter Graham, and Leader, pleasant as ever, and there is one little gem of Brett's sunny sea and the rocks he loves to paint; but we confess that the first vivid pleasure we experienced was in the Water-colour room. There it is probably impossible to sin so grossly as in oils, and if the work is not so pretentious there is much that is fresh and really delightful. The President is represented there by what is perhaps the most perfect picture in the whole exhibition (1140), by no means large, but exquisite in its presentment of the "Isola San Giuliano," an island upon which one looks down from a height, resting in the bosom of an Italian lake, with wooded hills beyond. And there is also a picture of Alfred Parson's "In Longleat Woods (1109), in which he has painted a glory of wild hyacinths and other flowers among the trees. What the professional critics may think, we cannot say, but we would rather have those two small pictures than acres of the oil-paintings which cover the walls in the other rooms. Among them we looked in vain for a great picture. In Frank Dicksee's picture, "The two Crowns" (167), the soul it might have had seems lost in the splendour of the trappings. One of the most striking pictures is W. A. Bouguereau's "La Vierge aux Lys" (297), in which, if the mother has a somewhat conventional beauty, the baby is wonderfully natural with the loveliness of a little child. "Ordered South," by J. H. F. Bacon (302), is one of several touching pictures representing the side of war in the home tragedy. Among the landscapes one of the most striking is a winter scene by J. Farquharson (339), with a motto wrested from a very different place, "And all the air in solemn silence holds" (stillness), Vicat Cole's, "Spring's Delights" (439), and Yeend King's "The Avon by Bredon Hill" (551). Mr. Colin Hunter's "London, from the Tower Bridge" (646), can hardly be called a landscape, but it is a very fine picture, and even more impressive is H. J. Draper's "The Ebb" (955), with the verses from Tennyson about the tide that "moving seems asleep, too full for sound and foam." Of pictures with a special personal interest for many of our readers, we noted Mrs. H. F. Morley's "Knock-hundred-row, Midhurst" (348), Miss Lucy Martineau's "Geese" (507), and in the Black and White room one of Mrs. Basil Martineau's last year's portraits of Dr. Martineau (1577), unfortunately hung rather out of reach.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

A CONVERT TO TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

Sir,—At a meeting held last year in connection with the Liverpool Conference of Domestic Mission Workers, I was (unwisely as I still think) tempted and taunted to defending my position as a life-long moderate drinker. I said then, and was at the time firmly convinced of it, that I should die as I had lived, and that I had full right to drink so long as I did not go to excess. As this was said at a public meeting, and reported in your columns and elsewhere, I ask leave of you to afford me the publicity of your paper in order to declare myself a convert to the principle and practice of total abstinence. I began so abstain simply for the sake of a little aelf-denial in sympathy with those who tre suffering at the seat of war. I found the habit grow upon me; and the conviction strengthened that, while it is very hard to keep the line between moderate drinking and what from the physiological if not moral point of view is excess, it is comparatively easy and perfectly safe to abstain altogether.

But I will not inflict upon the brethren I have left, or upon those whom I now join, a long account "Why I became a Teetotaller." Converts' reasons are generally more interesting to themselves than to other people. Only before leaving for America I desire to put it on record that I retract all I have said on behalf of drink, and to declare myself henceforth a recruit (alas, a very elderly recruit) to the cause of temperance. I may or may not use alcoholics as medicine; I intend never again to use them as a beverage.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

Sir,—May I again draw the attention of your readers to our Children's Holiday fund. There is each year an increasing need for the little town-bred children to be renewed in body and spirit by the healthy and more wholesome atmosphere of country life. In a town, among all classes, there is a tendency to limit our interest to the excitements and comforts that a civilised life can produce; it is only by being lifted out of these that we are shown the insignificance of their value compared with the richer growth of life obtained through the joys of Nature and the freedom of country pursuits. A fortnight is a short time to accomplish such a work, but it does, at least, give the children a taste for better things. I know some young men who were sent down as boys to a country village, and who, now, when they have a holiday, often run down to that same village for a few days on their own account.

I acknowledge with many thanks subscriptions already received from Mr. Hugh Martineau, £3 3s.; Mr. Morton, £1 1s.; Dr. Harris, £1 1s.; Miss Hibbert, £1 1s.; Mr. Troup, £2 2s.; Mr. Plumptre, £1 1s.; Mr. Heape, £1 1s.; and I shall gratefully receive further contributions.

Any parcels of clothing kindly made for the use of the children should be sent before the end of June, addressed to the General Secretary, Miss Toye, 156, Stepney-green, London, E.

THE LATE MISS LISTER.

Sir,—In your obituary notice of my valued friend, Miss Annie V. Lister, mention is made of the lively interest she took in the Roslyn Hill Schools. I should like to add that it was mainly through her efforts that instruction in cookery was afforded to the girls attending those schools.

Fourteen or fifteen years ago there was no cookery school in Hampstead, and at that time it was impracticable to establish one. Miss Lister, therefore, began by persuading the managers of the Roslyn Hill Schools to send the girls of a proper age to the cookery centre at the Carlton Road Board Schools in Kentish Town, where they were received as long as there was room for them for a small fee; and there, I believe, they attended until it could be arranged with other Hampstead schools to hire a room in which cookery instruction might be given.

Ultimately Miss Lister had the satisfaction of seeing a school built in Hampstead for such teaching; partly supported by voluntary contributions, partly by the Government grant, and possibly from other sources. R. Davenport Hill.

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

On Sunday last, 29th ult., the Rev Arthur W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden, preached the annual sermons on behalf of the above Association in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast. His morning subject, "Jesus our Master," and that of the evening, "This do and thou shalt live," were treated in an able and eloquent manner, and clearly set out the distinctive position of the Association. The collections were very good, better somewhat than last year.

The annual business meeting of the Association was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, the next Monday evening, and was well attended.

After tea the chair was taken by Mr. Thomas Andrews, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly submitted the annual report. It stated that the work of the Association had been steadily pushed forward, and there had been a continued demand for literature expository of their principles. A very large number of tracts and pamphlets had been given away during the year. A number of publications of the American Unitarian Association had been found very serviceable, and particularly in the work of the Postal Mission. The appeal made in the report of the previous year for a Twentieth Century Fund was renewed. The thanks of the Association were rendered to Mr. C. J. M'Kisack, who had been compelled through pressure of business, to resign the post of co-secretary of the Association, but would still act on the Committee. The ladies in charge of the Postal Mission had reported that from April 5, 1899, to Feb. 28, 1900, they had received seventy-eight applications, in reply to which they have sent literature by Channing, Freeman Clarke, Brooke Herford, and others, illustrative of the Unitarian position. The inquiries come from all parts of the United Kingdom—some from people in a very humble rank. The work had been somewhat of an experiment, but the amount of success which had attended it warrants its continuation and even extension.

The Secretary also submitted the financial statement, which showed a balance in hand of £56 6s. 1d. on Dec. 31 last, but he explained that over £100 had been paid away since.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, thanked the audience for asking him to preside, and said that the Ulster Unitarian Association rendered most valuable services to their churches, particularly by placing within the reach of all much of the literature by which many eminent divines had been endowed. By the diffusion of this literature their principles had become better known, and unquestionably much good had been done. Their thanks were due to the Hon. Secretary, Hon. Treasurer, and Committee for having undertaken the work which fell to the lot of the Society. He was proud to be a member of the Unitarian Church, in which he was brought up, and in which he intended to spend the remainder of his days. He had been often surrounded by members of other Churches, but from them all he had never received anything but kindness, and he thought that those who found their Unitarianism a barrier ought to examine themselves and see if the fault did not lie at their own door. Looking at the past year, they could not congratulate themselves on any large increase to their numbers, but they could rejoice in seeing year by year the spirit of liberality and toleration growing stronger and stronger in every Protestant Church by which they were surrounded.

Mr. James Davidson, in seconding the motion, referred to the Postal Mission as a new departure, but one that showed that the Association was up to date in accomplishing its work. He thought it was doing a useful work, not only to Unitarians, but to the whole of the Churches of Christendom. It did not put before the world a new religion, but it went back to the old type of Christianity—that Scriptural Christianity which was taught by Christ and his apostles.

The report and statement of accounts were unanimously adopted.

Mr. John Rogers moved, and Mrs. Riddel seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to the Rev. A. W. Fox for the valuable services he had rendered to the Association by his sermons on Sunday, and Mr. Fox, in replying, said it was a great pleasure to him to come once a year to Ireland. He was not ashamed to be known as a Unitarian. He wished they could get a real baptism of living fire, so that they could send their truths forth with power and teach men to be true to themselves.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY moved—"That this meeting heartily approves of the suggestion contained in the report regarding the raising of a special fund in commemoration of the twentieth century, and hereby gives full power to the Committee to take the matter in hand and prosecute it to a successful issue." That, he said, was a step in the right direction, and no one need ask what was going to be done with the money. If they could trust those in charge of the affairs of the Association, they should trust them to make a right use of the money when they got it.

The Rev. T. DUNKERLEY seconded the resolution, which was passed.

A resolution pledging the meeting to adhere to the principles and objects of the Association as set forth in the rules was passed, on the motion of the Rev. W. NAPIER, seconded by the Rev. Dr. MELLONE.

Votes of thanks to the Chairman and the ladies who provided the tea brought the meeting to a close.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

THIS week our thoughts naturally turn to London, and we are anxious that the bazaar being held there may be a great success. Our ladies have been busy for some time past, making preparation for the Manchester district stall, and we feel sure that those who have gone to London to dispose of their wares will prove themselves good saleswomen. We fully realise that you will want all the money you get, and a great deal more, if the work in such a vast centre as London is to be adequately grappled with. We in Manchester have found out how comparatively little can be done with £10,000. We have allocated or paid away £9,000 of it already; while at the same time, and in addition, the churches of this district have raised and are spending £20,000 more in building operations and church and school improvements. All this is a proof of our vitality and resource; and it goes without the saying that there must be a great deal of enthusiasm at the back of it all. Yet, we feel that it is by no means time to sit down in contentment. Fine, convenient buildings we shall have throughout the district within the next twelve months; but that in itself is not enough. We feel that the time has come for some special effort to be made in stimulating the religious life of our churches. It may be that in being too intent upon fostering the development of new churches we have rather neglected to consider the needs of the old ones. The Manchester District Association is regarding this matter very earnestly and thoroughly, and is determined to do all it possibly can to give an impetus to our church life. With this object in view it has issued the following letters to ministers, delegates, and church secretaries; and already gratifying interest and sympathy have been manifested in and with its spirit and principle:—

"The coming winter will cover the transition from the nineteenth century to the twentieth century, and in many ways this interesting event will be chronicled. Our fellow-Christians of other Churches up and down the country are raising enormous sums of money, with which to extend and strengthen their efforts during the early years of the new century. Their zeal for the Gospel is enabling them to almost work miracles in the matter of accumulating resources for what will be a unique crusade, to promote the worship of God amongst men. Are we less Christian than they, less stirred by the love of God and of our fellow-men, that we, of all the Churches of Christendom, should do nothing involving special effort and special sacrifice during the coming winter? Do not we, members of those churches which form the Manchester District Association, believe our free unfettered faith to be the most beautiful and helpful and inspiring of all Christian faiths, because it comes nearest to what Jesus Christ himself taught? and ought not our enthusiasm, therefore, to be greater and not less than that which is now urging our fellow-men to such a supreme effort?

"We, the Governing Body of your Association, who have been appointed to initiate and organise its work of promoting the best interests of the churches, feel very keenly that the time has come for some exceptional effort to be made to stir up the life of our congregations and make them supremely discontented with the present state of affairs. We look round upon the condition of things in our twenty-two churches, and though some of them have a most encouraging vitality, and successfully discover how to grapple with the problems that beset them, others are in a condition of unprofitable anxiety, absorbed with financial difficulties, and failing to appeal to the religious consciousness, not only of the general populace, but also of their own enrolled members. Yet we are told that the Unitarian leaven is working in all the Churches, and that those Unitarians within our own fold are a mere bagatelle compared with those who are without it. Nor can we forget the vast number of people who go nowhere, having broken away from Orthodoxy, and of whom many might be expected to find a spiritual home with us.

"There is something wrong, somewhere. Can we find it out, and set it right? The Association desires to do so, if it can. Will the congregations trust it, and make use of it, and seek its advice and help, which it is eager and ready to give? It wants to create a new interest in the affirmative aspects of our glorious faith. It desires to carry its gospel into highways and byeways this coming winter. We feel that the living God is calling upon us to-day to remember the self-sacrificing spirit of our fathers, who fought and won and bequeathed to us that inheritance of liberty and faith which we value more than all the world besides; and commanding us to do something for the uplifting and enlightening of this generation, which shall warrant our children's children honouring and emulating us.

"Can you tell us how we can set aflame the population of this district with a burning desire to know more of God's truth, and to aspire towards a more complete fulfilment of His will? This is equally your duty and ours.

1.—Could we rouse your neighbourhood by organising a series of religious services, with affirmative discourses calculated to deepen the spiritual life and bring light and hope to dark and doubting minds, in some Public Hall, on week evenings or on Sunday afternoons?

2.—Can we give strength and impetus to your own Church life by helping you to organise such services and discourses in your own building? We know from experience that these efforts do sometimes bring special results when specially made.

3.—Have you any difficulties which you deem peculiarly great, and which you think might be overcome, if only the right way could be discovered? and would you accept our offer of confidential Conference, just to see whether some means may be devised for enabling you to take a new and stronger lease of life in the new century?

4.—Is there any way whatever in which we can be of service to you in your Church life?

"We are not taking this matter up lightly. It appeals to us as a most serious obligation, and we are going to carry it through. We are not, and we know of nobody who is, satisfied with the present general condition of our churches; but we cannot, we will not, believe that it is impossible to advance the interests of such a grand faith as ours, if only sufficient heart and resource is put into our effort, and if only we work together in hearty co-operation.

"May we ask you to bring this matter promptly and earnestly before your Committee, or your Congregation; and to give us some expression of opinion concerning it before the end of June.

"We shall most heartily welcome any advice and help you can offer, or any suggestion you can make."

A stranger to the life and work of our Manchester group of churches might be disposed to think the spirit of this letter was pessimistic; but it is not. We cannot despair in face of such a hopeful outlook as we have. The fields are ripe to harvest. We never had a grander opportunity than we have now. A more desirable time for our effort than next winter can scarcely be conceived. The whole religious world will be more than usually astir. There will be a sentiment about the transition from one century to another which will do much to help us. If only all the energy and earnestness of all the churches can be concentrated upon a joint scheme of work for next winter, the thoughtful religious life of this large community will be appealed to as it never has been before. It is enthusiasm we want, and whole-souled enterprise, such as is only possible when the churches band together as one, and engage in a hearty co-operation. We have some splendid workers in our Manchester Churches—men and women moved by a strong faith, who are prepared to spend and be spent in advancing God's Kingdom on earth and in extending the possession of God's truth. They always rise to the occasion, and I am sure that this grand opportunity, foreshadowed in the Association's letter, will not be allowed by them to slip by unimproved.

We are sorry to learn that the Rev. P. M. Higginson has resigned the pastorate of Monton Church, and that on account of ill-health he will travel abroad for a while. The Monton friends will suffer a keen loss, and so also will the District Association of which Mr. Higginson has been President, and on whose Committee he has served faithfully and helpfully. He has endeared himself to the ministers of the district by his fraternal co-operation and sympathy, and we all wish him bon voyage and a safe return in restored health and strength.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached to large congregations, on Sunday, by the Rev. W. E. George, M.A., of Swinton. The choir, assisted by members of the Chowbent choir, and that of the Leigh Congregational Church, rendered the anthems, "Ye that stand in the House of the Lord," "Shepherd of Souls," and "Oh, worship the King." The collections amounted to £23 6s. 1d., being an increase on former collections for some years.

Birkenhead.—The closing services in the Charing-cross Church were held on Sunday, April 29, and there was a special meeting of the congregation in the morning for the purpose of passing a resolution to reaffirm their unfaltering belief in the great principles to which the church was dedicated—the free and reverent worship of Almighty God, the Father of all mankind, in the spirit of His son, Jesus Christ—and to place on record their grateful remembrance of the heritage of religious earnestness in the service of God and man, which the founders and supporters of the church have left behind them. They also decided to preserve a copy of the resolution, together with a photograph of the building and copies of the sermons preached at the closing services, within the foundation stone of the building to be erected in Bessborough-road, Birkenhead. The resolution was proposed by Mr. C. W. Willmer, seconded by Mr. P. Dickinson, and unanimously passed. Next Sunday, and until the new church is built, the congregation meet in the Church Hall, at Bessborough-road. Before morning service on Sunday, May 6, there is to be a recital on the organ, which has been presented to the congregation by Mr. George Bewlay Dalby, in memory of his wife.

Burton-on-Trent.—During April the Burton-on-Trent Unitarian Society, which holds services at the Town Hall, has been in charge of Mr. F. H. Vaughan, B.A., late Scholar at Manchester College, Oxford, and much good work has been done. A children's service on the Sunday morning has been started, and a library of Unitarian literature formed. The church has adopted the Essex Hall hymnal and the Ten Services of public prayer. Last Sunday Mr. G. L. Phelps, of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, took the service, and Mr. J. C. Warren brought over about twenty friends from Nottingham, who contributed anthems and a solo, making the service a most enjoyable one, and the room was crowded. On the last Sunday of Mr. Vaughan's stay a meeting of the congregation was held, when a resolution in appreciation of his work, and thanking him for his efforts, was passed; also one thanking the North Midland Association for their help from the commencement of the services, and to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for help towards the expenses of the late week-evening lectures, and for their grant of books to the library; also to the other subscribers at Leicester to the same object.

Heaton Moor.—After some delay in the transfer of the land at the corner of King's-drive and Heaton Moor-road, the purchase has now been completed on behalf of the Manchester Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, and the contractors have begun work. The corner plot is left vacant for a church building in the future, when the congregation shall require it; at present a school-church, to accommodate 150 people, is being erected, and its completion is promised within five months. Although the Reform Hall, in which the congregation is meeting, is not favourable for increased activities, a Sunday-school has been successfully started, and is attended mainly by the children of members of the congregation.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. Harold Rylett having resigned the ministry of Fort-road Church, the Rev. D. Amos, late of Reading, has kindly undertaken the duties during the month of May, including the Sunday-school anniversary and flower services, to be held on May 27.

London: Highgate.—The Rev. J. T. Sunderland, M.A., who is preaching for six months at Highgate, has received from the congregation a cordial invitation to accept the pastorate of the church, which many friends in London beyond the immediate circle of the congregation will hope that he may be able to accept.

London: Stepney.—On Thursday evening, April 26, the annual meeting of the congregation of College Chapel was held. The schoolroom was well filled, and the tone of the meeting was bright and hopeful. Dr. Herbert Smith occupied the chair. After the report and accounts had been passed, and a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Tavener, Miss Florence Hill, and Miss Read had been given the Revs. H. Woods Perris and R. H. U. Bloor addressed the meeting. Miss Tagart and Mr. Vizard, in moving and seconding the report, spoke with sympathy of the work at Stepney, and specially commended the spirit of the teachers and the behaviour of the Sunday scholars. The report, read by Mr. Evans, the secretary, expressed the unanimous satisfaction of the congregation in being able to retain Mr. Tavener amongst them, their appreciation of his pulpit addresses, and of his superintendence of the Sunday-school, which is now in splendid order. There is a steady and slightly increasing attendance at evening service. The Band of Hope and Mercy, Elder Scholars' Guild, &c., continue to meet, and the spirit of harmony and cheerfulness which prevails makes up in a degree for the smallness of the numbers. All have worked hard for the London Unitarian Bazaar. The Chapel Committee feel very grateful for the generous grants from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the London District Unitarian Society, and to the friends who have formed a Finance Committee, with Dr. Herbert Smith as treasurer, to raise a guarantee fund for the salary of a lay-worker for Stepney and Stratford, and are very glad that Mr. Tavener has accepted this position. Mr. Tavener, in responding to the vote of thanks, said that the present arrangement of dividing his time between Stepney and Stratford had the advantage of drawing together the two congregations, who had mutually helped each other on several occasions. After the business meeting, the work for the London Unitarian Bazaar, done by the members and scholars, were shown, and also an oil picture, "Christ Blessing Little Children," painted by the youths of the Elder Scholars' Guild, under Mr. Tavener's guidance.

Long Sutton.—The two-hundredth anniversary of this ancient place of worship, and the tenth of the Rev. W. J. Pond's settlement, was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, 29th and 30th ult. On Sunday two sermons were preached by the Rev. Harvey Smith, Bethnal Green-road, London. In the afternoon his subject was "Leaving the Past," and in the evening "Pressing Forward." The tea on Monday was the largest this generation has witnessed, the most pleasing feature being the presence of friends from the Unitarian Church, King's Lynn. At the public meeting which followed, the principal speakers were the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, and Harvey Smith, who represented the General Baptist Assembly. Other speakers were Miss Cadman, of the Society of Friends, Mr. Bush, from Lynn, and the minister. The chair was occupied by the treasurer, Mr. Boltz, who opened the meeting with a stirring historical speech, striking the key-note for other speakers. Remembering the "Act of Toleration," passed May 24, 1689, the gathering was an evidence of the vast growth of Christian toleration, for, as one of the speakers remarked, "we have represented here not only Baptists, Methodists, Congregationalists, Quakers, and Unitarians, but mingling with us members of the Established Church. Surely Christian unity is coming." A resolution of confidence in Mr. Pond's ministry and a desire for him to continue his struggles here was heartily carried.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The annual conversazione was held at Denton on Saturday last, and was most successful, about 250 persons being present. Representatives, and the whole of the ministers with two exceptions, were present from all the fourteen schools in the Union. After tea, the President, Mr. John Barrow occupied the chair, wearing the gold medal presented to him by the late President of the M.D.S.S.A., for Sunday-school services, now covering a period of fifty-three years. He was supported by the Vice-President (the Rev. T. R. Elliott), the Rev. L. Scott, and Mr. A. Slater (hon. sec.). An interesting vocal and instrumental entertainment was given, including part songs by the Wilton-street Singing Class, and concluding with an amusing dramatic sketch. A cordial vote of thanks to the Denton friends was accorded, on the motion of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A. (who also welcomed the Rev. C. E. Oliver, B.A., as a member of the Union, on his settlement at Denton), seconded by the Rev. A. L. Smith, B.A. Revs. L. Scott and C. E. Oliver responded, and the latter gentleman moved, and the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., seconded a vote of thanks to the Chairman, to which he fittingly responded. The gathering was one of the most successful ones held by the Union.

Sheffield.—A very pleasant gathering of members of the Unitarian congregations of Sheffield and the district was held at Channing Hall on April 26. After tea, the chair was taken by Mr. Wostinholm, who was supported by the Revs. J. E. Manning, J. T. Sunderland, John Lee (of the Loxley Independent Chapel), J. Ellis, J. Stephens, Iden Payne, Vernon Herford, A. Bennett, and Mr. Edward Bramley. Mr. Sunderland, speaking as a Yorkshireman, who had spent most of his life in America, gave a striking address on "Emerson," Mr. Bennett spoke on "The Conduct of Public Worship." Mr. Lee, speaking as a Congregationalist, said that while naturally thinking his own Church the best, he had a keen appreciation of the excellence of the Unitarian, and especially its freedom of thought and liberty of conscience. Other speeches followed. On Sunday, at Upper Chapel, the Rev. J. E. Manning delivered an interesting appreciation of Cowper, in connection with the centenary of the poet's death.

Sunderland (Appointment).—The Rev. Francis Wood has received a unanimous invitation to take charge, for twelve months, of the church at Sunderland, and has accepted the same.

Walthamstow.—A vocal and instrumental concert was given on Thursday, April 26, in aid of the Indian Famine Fund. About 150 persons were present, and an interesting programme was gone through in a very creditable manner. Nearly £4 15s. was realised, and the following Sunday evening's collection was added, making a total of £5, the whole of which will be forwarded to Mr. Ion Pritchard, at Essex Hall, the expenses, which amounted to less than £1, being defrayed by private subscription among the members of the church.

OBER AMMERGAU.—A lady, who speaks German, and has been to the Play, would like to escort two or four young ladies in June. Expenses only required. — Address, Miss CLIFTON, INQUIRER Office.

APPOINTMENT desired by lady as HOUSEKEEPER to gentleman, or COMPANION-HOUSEKEEPER to lady; large experience; highest references; moderate salary; country preferred. — Address, Miss MELROSS, Churnet Croft, Wall Grange, Stoke-on-Trent.

WITH reference to the dreadful Indian famine, we find in the Christian World the following note:—

The service at Lyndhurst-road Church on Sunday morning last was remarkable and significant. In place of the usual sermon the great congregation listened first of all, and with rapt attention, to an able statement by an Anglo-Indian layman on the present famine in India, and then to an impassioned appeal to them from Dr. Horton to do their duty as Christian people to their famine-stricken Indian fellow-subjects. After statement and appeal came a great collection. In looking upon the scene one felt instinctively that here was a model of the Christian assembly of the future; the people gathered together first for worship, and then to discuss, in the name of Christ, the world's great human needs, and in His name to do what in them lay towards remedying them. So far as India is concerned, it is to be hoped that the example set by Lyndhurst-road—which previous to last Sunday had raised £160 for the Famine Fund—will be extensively followed. The people of England have not yet begun to realise this famine, whose awful effects now reach, it is computed, to near 90,000,000 of people, nor to ask themselves the question what relation the ever-increasing recurrence of these calamities bears to the English rule.

From Carlisle we have received a collecting card, which is being used by the members of the Unitarian Church and the children of the Sunday-school. On the back of the card is printed an appeal for contributions, and a few pointed words as to the horrors of the famine.

BEFORE these words reach the other side of the Atlantic our friends will be already gathering in Boston, to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association, which is likewise the anniversary of our own Association, founded on the same day, in the same year, 1825. Here we would offer brief, but heartfelt congratulations, which will be more fully offered on the spot, with the greetings of the mother country, by our British representatives the Revs. Charles Hargrove and W. Copeland Bowie, Mr. Ion Pritchard and Miss Marian Pritchard. The celebration, which begins on Sunday, the 20th inst., and concludes on Friday, the 25th, the actual anniversary day, will have something of the character of an International Unitarian Conference, for in addition to this country, India will be represented by Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, who is now on his way to Boston, and Mr. B. C. Pal, who has been for some time in America; Japan will be represented by the Revs. T. Murai and Kinzo Hirai, as well as Mr. Clay MacCauley, who has just returned from that country after ten years of service as American representative at Tokyo. Transylvania will be represented by our friend and correspondent, Professor George Boros, Dean of the Theological school at Kolozsvár, and Germany by Professor Oppert, of Berlin. The Rev. J. Hocart is on his way from Brussels, and the Christian Register also expects Signor Bracciforti from Milan. The French Liberal Churches, and the Protestantenbond of Holland, are also to send delegates, but we have not yet learned their names.

WE quoted a fortnight ago from a remarkable speech made by the Bishop of Calcutta, presiding in that city over a meeting held in memory of Dr. Martineau. One sentence in that speech particularly has attracted a good deal of interest, the sentence in which Dr. Welldon quoted a saying of Dr. Martineau's in conversation with himself, to the effect that, "Unitarian though he was, yet when he surveyed the course of ecclesiastical history, he was glad it was the Athanasian and not the Arian view of our Lord's person which had won the day in Christendom." Those who conclude from this saying that Dr. Martineau was glad that present-day Trinitarian theology should prevail over Unitarian, show very little discernment of his meaning. In reference to this matter, we have received a letter from the venerable Henry Solly, expressing goodwill towards THE INQUIRER as serving the cause of pure religion, "which is to grow, not by one-sided outbursts of bitter hostility against all who may not see eye to eye with ourselves, but by learning from others those portions of Divine truth with which they have been entrusted from above"; and then speaking as follows of the distinction between the Athanasian and the Arian view:—

The distinction is of unspeakable importance in the development of the controversy which Unitarians have so persistently and courageously carried on, but which has too often been pursued to a fatal result according to the great law of controversy which so continually drives the enemies of error into the opposite extreme. It so happened that about forty years ago, when I was writing an essay on the Doctrine of At-onement, that I had the exceptional privilege of learning from the late Alexander John Scott, of Manchester, the truth which had not been vouchsafed to me in the course of my Unitarian education. He explained to me that it would be fatal to the cause of religious doctrinal truth in our community, if Arian views were substituted in that community for the view which Athanasius took of the relation of Jesus Christ as the Son of God to "Our Father in Heaven." For Athanasius strenuously contended for the Divine Sonship of Christ, while the success of Arius would have placed our Lord in the category of the creatures of God instead of the filial relationship. I can feel no doubt that this was the ground of Dr. Martineau's preference for the one doctrine rather than the other, as described by the Bishop of Calcutta—and for that description I feel personally so grateful that I thought it possible you might think it worth while to insert the foregoing explanation in your next issue. To me it seems of unspeakable importance that the distinction now insisted on should receive due appreciation from all who while rejecting the Athanasian Creed, which, of course, was not written by Athanasius, are nevertheless equally opposed to the doctrine still constantly urged by a happily decreasing number of earnest and devout Christians.

We are not sure that we quite understand what the doctrine is to which Mr. Solly refers as "still constantly urged," but Dr. Martineau's satisfaction in the victory of the Athanasian over the Arian view in the fourth century has been and is undoubtedly shared by many thoughtful Unitarians. At the heart of the doctrine of Athanasius, however it might afterwards be formulated in the doctrine of the Trinity, was the vital religious truth of an essential spiritual unity between Christ, the Son of God, and the Eternal, whom we know as Father. The proper outcome of this doctrine, as it appears to us, is not the ecclesiastical doctrine of the Trinity, or the three Gods who seem so easily to emerge out of the "Divine Society" of which some modern theologians make so much, but just that spiritual Unitarianism, of which Dr. Martineau has been in our time the great representative, in accordance with which not the one Son of God alone, but all living souls, in their divine capacity, angels in the heights and the children in our homes, are seen to be in an essential spiritual unity, to be perfected according to the purpose of Eternal Love, in the one Household of God. The doctrine of Divine Immanence, now prevalent among Trinitarians and Unitarians alike, may suggest some new interpretation of the Trinity, but far nearer to the religion of Jesus, and what we take to be the abiding spiritual truth, is that Unity in which, among the children of God, Christ is recognised as "the first-born of many brethren," the "Chief of faithful souls." It was because the Athanasian rather than the Arian doctrine of the fourth century seemed to Dr. Martineau to lead more directly to that result, that he expressed the preference which has been quoted.

WHILE the interest of this question is fresh in our readers' minds, we are glad to offer for their consideration an essay by the Rev. Charles E. Beeby, B.D., Vicar of Yardley Wood, near Birmingham, on "Unitarian and Trinitarian: a Theological Eirenicon," the first part of which appears in our present issue. Mr. Beeby's remarkable book on "Creed and Life," and the somewhat vehement controversy which arose out of it, called wide-spread attention to his thoughtful and earnest interpretation of religious truth, and we count it a privilege to be allowed to publish his present essay. It is to be completed in our next week's issue.

A SECOND Summer Sessions for Sunday-school Teachers, organised by the Sunday School Association, is to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, from July 6 to 14, and a circular of invitation has been sent out by Mr. Ion Pritchard, the hon. secretary of the Association to the schools throughout the country. The first session, held last year, was so eminently successful, and so much enjoyed by those who took part in it, that there is sure to be an immediate and warm response. The limit of the accommodation at Manchester College is set down at 150, so that teachers wishing to take part in the session will do well to send in their applications at once. It is desirable that as many schools as possible should be represented, and where expense seems an insuperable obstacle, it is suggested that the teachers of a school would do well to subscribe to send one of their number, who would then bring back to them a report of the proceedings and the stimulus derived from so delightful a gathering of friends and fellow-workers. It is estimated that the cost of board and lodging (including midday meal in common) need not exceed 30s. for the whole session, or 25s. for the week. Mr. J. H. Woods, M.A., of Manchester College, has again undertaken to act as local secretary.

THE programme of the Session is to be much on the same lines as last year. There are to be two lectures each morning, the first being this year given not by different teachers, but as a consecutive course by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," which will take up the history of the struggle for Freedom of Inquiry; the Revised Version; changed views of the Old Testament and the Gospels; and the position of the Bible in the Church. The second lecture will be devoted to practical matters connected with Sunday-school work, among the lecturers already announced being the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, W. Copeland Bowie, and John Byles, and Miss Marian Pritchard. The opening service on Friday, July 6, is to be conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and in the evening of that day Dr. and Mrs. Drummond will hold a reception in the College Library. An advertisement with reference to this Summer Session will be found in our present issue.

WE noted last week the Archbishops' decision on the subject of Reservation. Lord Halifax, as was to be expected, takes high ground in a letter to the Church Times, as an upholder of the teaching and practice of "Christ's Holy Catholic Church," concluding as follows:—"The laity will not consent to run the risk of dying without the Sacraments. Reservation for the sick and dying cannot be given up." Mr. Athelstan Riley is also roused to open rebellion, and it is reported that some 300 members of the Society of the Holy Cross are agreed that no change must be made in their present use with regard to the Reserved Sacrament. What the Bishops will do remains to be seen. With them it rests, whether there shall be any attempt at effectual discipline.

THE Guardian in a leading article writes with strong disapproval of Lord Halifax's utterance, and then adds:—

We do not doubt that in some quarters there will be a disposition to press for disestablishment as the remedy for the present difficulties. There are, doubtless, many worse evils than disestablishment; we are by no means blind to certain disadvantages which attend an Established Church, and if we thought that Mr. Birrell were right in speaking of Establishment as "the greatest opiate that the wisdom of man has yet devised for a Church" we should be prepared to join hands with the Liberation Society to-morrow. But whilst the immediate loss to the Church from disestablishment would be certain, the gain is perhaps less sure, and as the present difficulties are not inherently connected with the fact of Establishment, it is reasonable to look in the first instance for some less violent remedy. The trouble, we say, does not arise from the connection with the State; no claim is being made for obedience to Parliament or to a secular tribunal, or for the acknowledgment of any Erastian principle whatever. The question is purely and simply one of the interpretation of the rubrics of the Church of England by the spiritual rulers of the Church of England. The Archbishops have given a decision which we venture to think is in accordance with the natural interpretation of the rubrics and articles.

The remedy which the Guardian suggests is first moderation and obedience to Episcopal authority, and then not disestablishment but reform of the Church for better adaptation to present needs, in which reservation strictly for the use of the sick and with proper safeguards may well have a place.

THE Rev. J. Hocart writes from Brussels to say that he is just starting for Boston, in response to an invitation from the American Unitarian Association to attend the Anniversary Meetings and the International Conference of Unitarians in that city. M. Hocart's third letter on the subject of the "Forgiveness of Sins" will therefore have to be postponed until his return.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—The Governors have appointed Mr. J. H. Woods, M.A., Cambridge, second master with special charge of the religious instruction. Mr. Woods was scholar of Peterhouse and a Wrangler. After teaching for eight years he entered Manchester College and is just completing his full course there.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

THE CRITICISM OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

III.

From 1866 to 1900.

IN 1866 Graf published a small volume on the "Historical Books of the Old Testament." The views which it propounded were by no means entirely new. Graf owed a great deal to Reuss, who had said much the same thing in lectures which were delivered in Graf's hearing as early as 1834. Some of Graf's chief results had also been anticipated by George in his book on "Jewish Feasts," and by Valke in his "Religion of the Old Testament," works which appeared simultaneously in 1835. If Graf was deeply indebted to his predecessors, he owed no less to his successors, to those distinguished scholars among whom Kuenen and Wellhausen hold the chief place, who embraced Graf's views, and at the same time corrected and extended them. Still, the new theory is rightly associated with Graf's name. He was the first to secure wide acceptance for it. This theory has effected nothing less than a revolution in current ideas on the development of Hebrew religion and ritual. There has been no serious reaction, nor do we think that any such reaction is possible. Arguments from which there is no escape have changed theory into demonstrated fact. Let us try to see what Graf's theory was, and how it reached this impregnable position.

It was, as we have seen, already admitted that the Hexateuch was made up of four documents. First, there was the Grundschrift, which supplied the framework of the whole, and contained that elaborate ritual system which occupies the final chapters of Exodus, the whole of Leviticus, and part of Numbers. Next, we have the Jahvist and Elohist works, which are chiefly legendary and historical, though they also comprise brief moral and religious codes—namely, the ancient statutes to be found in Exodus xxxiv., the Decalogue in Exodus xx., and the Book of the Covenant, Exodus xx-xxiii. Lastly, we have the legislation of Deuteronomy. Further, the date of Deuteronomy was approximately known; it was generally agreed that it could not be very much older than its publication by Josiah in 621 B.C. But it was also taken for granted that the priestly legislation of the middle books—in other words, the code connected with the Grundschrift, or priestly document—was older than Deuteronomy. Now it was precisely this assumption which Graf disproved. He showed that the priestly code is later than Deuteronomy, and is, indeed, post-exilic.

The reasons may be briefly stated thus. The priestly legislation sharply distinguishes between priests and Levites. In Deuteronomy, on the contrary, priests and Levites are identified: the author implies throughout that every Levite may by right officiate as a priest: "the priests, the Levites," is the phrase which is habitual with him, and as if to exclude the least doubt on the point, he speaks in xviii. 1 of "the priests, the Levites, all the tribe of Levi." Here, then, there is absolute contradiction. All Levites are priests according to one code; only a particular clan of Levites claiming descent from Aaron are priests according to the other. Which of these views is the older of the two? Clearly that of Deuteronomy. No writing previous to the exile recognises any distinction between Levites and Aaronic priests, and in Ezekiel xliv. 10-16, we can see the later legislation on this matter just starting into life. This prophet who frames a ritual legislation of his own, needless and impossible, if that of the Hexateuch had already existed, implies that as yet all Levites might act as priests. As, however, most Levites had taken part in the worship on the High Places, he proposes to degrade them for the future. They are not to "perform the office of priest or to come near any of "the holy things any longer." They are to be degraded into ministers of the second rank, and the priesthood is to be limited in all future time to the descendants of Zadok (xliii. 19). Ezekiel, then, is the bridge between Deuteronomy and the post-exilic law. Deuteronomy acknowledges cheerfully and fully the right of all Levites to the priesthood, though by abolishing the High Places it deprived many Levites of their bread. Ezekiel limits the priesthood to the sons of Zadok, while the legislation of the Grundschrift carries the distinction between priests and mere Levites back to the very dawn of Israel's history, and represents the priestly line as successors and descendants of Aaron, the brother of Moses. This is but one of many arguments which converge to the same conclusion. The High Priest is in the legislation of the middle books the head of the theocracy; he is invested with a royal and sacrosanct character; but there is no notice of such a personage before the exile. Again, the modest provision for the Levitical priests in Deuteronomy is left far behind in Leviticus and Numbers.

In these latter books, the tithes of the field and herd were assigned to them; theirs were the first-born of beasts; theirs the redemption money for the first-born of women. They held forty-eight cities and ample pasture-lands around them in inalienable possession. It is surely inconceivable that the Deuteronomist who pleads so pathetically for the Levites should have ignored these generous provisions, if he had ever heard of them. It is equally inconceivable, on the hypothesis that the priestly code is pre-exilic, that Ezekiel, himself a priest of the temple, should have made, as he does, a provision in land for the priests and Levites without the least reference to existing Levitical cities.*

Graf separated the legislation of the middle books from the narrative portions of the Grundschrift. It was easy for Kuenen and others to show that legislation and narrative are of one piece. The narrative which is the setting of the post-exilic law uses the same language and style as the code, and breathes throughout the same theocratic spirit. For the living and often touching stories of the older writers, we find in the Grundschrift or Priestly document a dry and annalistic record which merely prepares the way for the ritual enactments.

We cannot here enter on the further progress made in the study of the Hexateuch. Much still remains to be decided. But the main lines have been fixed permanently by Graf as amended by Kuenen and Wellhausen. In the Hexateuch the history of Hebrew religion now lies unveiled — we have the early and partly pre-prophetic element in the Jahvist and Elohist; we have the religious and humane spirit of the prophets nobly represented and embodied in Deuteronomy; we have the monotheism and morality of the prophets providentially combined with strict ritual law in the priestly writer. It is now also recognised that the various documents are the work of schools rather than of single individuals, and underwent various recensions which have left their marks on the existing text. But for all this we must refer the curious reader to the full and clear discussion by Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Battersby of the critical questions connected with the gradual compilation of the Hexateuch.

It need scarcely be said that Graf's theory on the relations of documents in the Hexateuch necessitated the modification and, even sometimes, the reversal of prevalent opinion on the whole history of Hebrew religion. It was now seen that the prophets instead of following the Priestly code, preceded it. Wellhausen tells us that for long he had been perplexed by the absence of allusion to this law in the prophetic writings, and the relief which he felt when the mystery was explained. At last it was possible to follow the progress of religion within Israel in a rational manner, and the results are before us in Stade's fascinating "History of Israel" (1887), or in the shorter but brilliant sketch of "Israelite and Jewish History," by Wellhausen. Excellent works on the history of the Hebrew Canon were written by Buhl, a Danish scholar; by Wildeboer, in Holland; and by Dr. Ryle, of Cambridge. The criticism of Isaiah is being studied with increasing success; it has been found that the last twenty-seven chapters cannot any more than the first thirty-nine be assigned to a single author, and attention has been directed to the fact which is now evident, that all prophetic writings have been more or less interpolated by the editorial hand of the scribes. We may mention among many books which deal with the prophetic texts those of Giesebrecht and Canon Cheyne on Isaiah, and that of Wellhausen on the Minor Prophets.

Hitherto we have confined ourselves to the Old Testament as interpreted by itself. Now, however, as everybody knows, a flood of light has been cast on the Old Testament by the monuments and inscriptions of other nations. It is true that the Egyptian hieroglyphs were deciphered as early as 1821, while even the Assyrian inscriptions in cuneiform began to be translated in 1851. Still, the application of this increased knowledge to the Old Testament belongs to our own time. So far as Babylonia and Assyria are concerned, we may date it from 1872, the year in which the first edition of Schrader's "Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament" appeared. The following must suffice as specimens of all that Biblical scholarship owes to Assyrian and Egyptian archæology. It is now certain from the Tel el Amarna tablets found in 1887 that about 1400 B.C. Palestine was subject to the suzerainty of Egypt, though at that time the power of the Pharaohs in Canaan was already waning. Those tablets also reveal the fact that long before this time Canaan had been subject to

* Graf's conclusions were adopted and loyally supported by Kalisch in his English commentary on Leviticus, 1867-1872.

Babylonian influence, insomuch that the Babylonian language and writing were still, at least for diplomatic purposes, in common use. We have Babylonian accounts of the Creation and of the Flood which closely resemble those in the Hebrew Bible, and it is manifest that these Babylonian myths travelled southwards to Israel, where they became a vehicle for the higher teaching of Hebrew revelation. The Sabbath is in all probability of Babylonian origin. But perhaps an accurate chronology is the most important contribution made by Assyrian research to the study of the Hebrew Bible. The Hebrews had no era, and the system of dates in the Books of Kings is artificial and worthless. The Assyrians, on the other hand, had an excellent method of fixing dates; and as great events in the history of Israel are mentioned from the time of Ahab onwards, we are enabled to date the reigns of the Kings in Judah and Northern Israel, sometimes with certainty and always with tolerable approach to certainty. We can but refer in passing to Mr. Flinders Petrie's discovery (1896) of the name "Israel" in an inscription of Merenptah, who is generally supposed to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus, to the inscription of Shishak at Karnak and to the Moabite stone (1868) with its account of the struggle between Moab and Israel in the time of Omri. On the connection of the inscription with Hebrew history and religion, the needful information may be got in Ball's "Light from the East," or in Dr. Driver's judicial essay in Hogarth's "Authority and Archæology."

One word in conclusion on the effect which the criticism of the Old Testament has exercised on religious belief. Naturally, critical views did at first painfully shock and wound many sincere and pious souls. It is, no doubt, also true that not a few in the face of critical difficulties have made shipwreck of their faith. But the more the Old Testament is really and critically understood the more, we are persuaded, will the supernatural character of the Old Testament revelation appear. All through the Old Testament God was revealing His mind and character to His chosen people, teaching them little by little His own nature and His purpose for them and for all men, till in the fulness of time He came, to whom the whole history of mankind was looking forward, and to whom all the prophets bear witness. Criticism does but exhibit this unique and supernatural revelation in its true and intelligible order. It is a cause for devout thankfulness that critics are beginning to feel that they are the allies and not the enemies of revelation. Nobody can affirm more decidedly than Dr. Driver has done that criticism, far from being hostile to the idea of inspiration, pre-supposes it. Only the other day Giesebrecht, one of the acutest and most learned critics now living, vindicated the supernatural origin of Hebrew prophecy; and no one could reasonably desire a tone more reverent and believing than that of Budde, a critic of acknowledged eminence. And Wildeboer, an eminent Dutch critic, closes his Preface to his "Literature of the Old Testament," with the confession, that he "holds fast to the belief that Israel was the subject of a special revelation which is fulfilled in that absolutely unique revelation bestowed upon us in our Lord Jesus Christ."

LITERATURE.

ETHICAL SUNDAY SCHOOL BOOKS.*

IT is impossible to read Mr. Sheldon's book without being impressed by the earnest seriousness of his aims in the Sunday-school, the comprehensiveness of his methods, and the thoroughness with which he carries them out. The sample lessons with which he illustrates his scheme are selected, he tells us, from between two and three thousand pages of type-written MS. They represent the working out into utmost detail of a complete scheme of Sunday-school instruction, which covers nine or ten years of the life of its pupils. It takes them as they emerge from babyhood, and does not leave them until they are young men and women. The author speaks of his work as "a sketch of a new type of Sunday-school," and if the wonderfully finished programme which he expounds is really carried out in the Ethical Society's School at St. Louis, that school must rival, in the consecutiveness and connectedness of its work, any other Sunday-school on earth. Instead of the intellectual chaos in which so many schools are content to welter—where each teacher chooses his own course, or series, or inconsequent file of lessons, and the superintendent's address has no reference to any of them—we have in this school a cosmos of almost forbidding rigour.

"With the youngest of the children, from the ages of seven to nine years, we begin with the Bible stories of the Old Testament. . . . At about the age of nine years we begin the systematic work we are outlining in our course of instruction. The first year is devoted to a study of the 'Habits.' . . . At about the age of ten or eleven we pass on to a series of studies connected with the 'institutions,' or what we might call 'institutional life,' taking up from year to year, first the 'Home,' then 'Citizenship and One's Country,' and afterwards the 'Self,' or 'The Duties to Oneself.' . . . At about the age of eleven or twelve we interrupt the series of institutional studies, and introduce a study of the 'Life of Jesus.' . . . We take the boys and the girls at the critical time between fifteen and sixteen years of age, and introduce them to the subject of religion." Each of these great heads of study is divided and subdivided, until the unit of a MS. lesson on some one definite point is reached.

After paying a due tribute to the unity of purpose and steady perseverance which have constructed this system, I must confess that the contemplation thereof makes me somewhat forlorn. It is so unyielding, so cut and dried, so regular. It reminds me of an industrial school, where the girls have their hair cut short and are forced to wear a uniform. Too little is conceded to the desultory, which is, in some sense, the instinctive guidance of nature. Yet the element of caprice, or even of the fortuitous, is by no means excluded. Why begin such a course, in which the Bible plays no further part, with Old Testament stories? There are many better story books for young children. Mr. Sheldon specifies thirteen stories, at least seven of which (including the "Plagues of Egypt") imply an undeveloped idea of God. Would it not be better to defer their use until our pupils can discriminate between history and legend? Mr. Sheldon himself deprecates the attempt "to teach little children the elements of a Higher Criticism"—in other words, to give them from the very first a true idea of the nature of the Bible. Until we can do that we ought surely to leave the Bible alone. The Old Testament stories which are really useful for infants can always be told, simply as tales, among other tales, in the teacher's own words. If his version should not tally exactly with Mr. Sheldon's—"It seems that Yahweh, the Ruler of the World, got to thinking about it, and He did not altogether approve of what was going on down there"—so much the better. Then again, the habits furnish a very convenient classification for practical ethic, but why is their study to be crowded into a year, and why into this particular year? By a series of such questions it could easily be shown that the author has not attained the ideally perfect scheme, which includes in just proportion all that is necessary and no more than is sufficient, and is indiscriminately applicable to all boys and girls. The obvious reply that such a scheme is beyond human powers, and that Mr. Sheldon cannot be blamed from failing to construct it, begets the answer that such a scheme, and nothing less, appears to be his aim in this work.

I cannot imagine that any of our superintendents would desire to adopt the scheme as a scheme. Strangely enough, the defect which might be regarded by a theist as most serious would probably not be felt in practice. Only by a mighty effort of sustained watchfulness could any believer in God avoid utterance of God's name until the prescribed moment had come for its introduction. The thoughts, throughout the book, are thoughts of God. Nevertheless, that part of his work which Mr. Sheldon regards as most valuable, the methodic part, will be of least use to us. We may derive thence, however, the hint to use—not this system, indeed, but—system itself, as an abstract virtue, in our Sunday-schools. A conference of teachers, a terminal syllabus, kindred lessons throughout the school, with a superintendent's address as a final word on the subject for the day—would not the adoption of these simple methods more than double the effective work in many schools? Mr. Sheldon pushes too far the principle of uniformity; he leaves too little to the teacher's initiative; but since our own fault lies at the other pole, we are more likely to be helped than hurt by trying to imitate him.

The actual matter of the lessons and courses given in the book cannot fail to be of use even to the experienced teacher, and it is as a suggestive, sometimes an inspiring, guide in the selection and treatment of topics that Mr. Sheldon will be most helpful. There are minor faults. One is a strangely uncritical use of very poor verse in the same breath with the very best, and a lax literary conscience which permits its owner to misquote. In the lesson on the Commandments we read, "The third was that they should not be profane," instead of "that they should keep their sworn promises." I do not like the pelting of young children with proverbs like those on p. 52: "The goslings would lead the geese to grass," and "Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works." They are neither generous nor just, and the second, in its distorted sense, not even true. Nor do I like this on p. 69: "But when the final question comes as to why one should obey, this theme always ends with the one crucial answer: Because they are my father and mother. These words are to be lodged with a fixity in the mind as if beyond analysis or explanation." This is mere juggling with words. If you are not prepared with a reason, say so, but do not offer as a reason that which the child must feel to be no reason at all. Perhaps he will not detect the fallacy; perhaps he will belabour his puzzled brains in vain to discover, if possible, how the fact that John Smith is Jack Smith's father implies that sons must obey parents. What can the result be? I should hope that he might lose his confidence in you, but he is just as likely, being a child, to lose confidence in himself; at the best, if he escapes without loss of faith (that is, loss of character), it can only be at the expense of his conception of truth: he has had to employ his will not in aid but in defiance of his reason—which is what Plato calls "the lie in the soul." A more refined age will probably regard such overbearing of a child's mind by blunt fallacies as less defensible than a physical assault: and it must be remembered that physical assaults on children, without any reason but the parents' state of temper, happen by thousands every day. Another point on which I think Mr. Sheldon is mistaken is his denial that "over-conscientiousness"—in other words, a morbidly nervous conscience—and a habit of self-scrutiny are sources of danger to the young. He confesses to a smile at the idea (p. 157). "The instances where this habit becomes injurious are so striking and peculiar that they stand out and attract attention by their very rarity." It may be so in St. Louis, though I doubt it. No English public schoolmaster will say the same of English boys. Self-analysis, especially the analysis of motive in regard to merit, is a common disease among the upper forms, and any indiscriminate appeal which encouraged such a trouble would be a sin against those sufferers who happened to hear it. Troops of Hamlets go up to Oxford and Cambridge every October. They had much better, for their own sake and that of the world, be men like Coriolanus or even Anthony.

These things I dislike, but there are very many more things in the book which every practical teacher will heartily applaud. Besides the outline lessons, the innumerable suggestions of lesson-subjects, the examples of treatment to which I have referred, there are pleasant descriptions of "picture-lectures" and musical services, a very thesaurus of golden thoughts from saintly writers, and several admirable "responsive services."

On the whole it is a book which every Sunday-school teacher, especially the superintendents, will do well to obtain.

Mr. Gould's book deals in thirty-eight lessons with two heads, Self-control and Truthfulness, out of thirteen which complete his plan. He is clearly a competent teacher, and will furnish his readers with a store of useful illustration, and many practical hints in the division of a subject. The lessons are intended for children aged from ten to fourteen years, but I should be more inclined to use them with children somewhat younger—from nine to eleven. E. W. LUMMIS.

THE NEW WORLD.*

THE number of The New World for December, 1899, completed the eighth volume of this valuable review, which, we were glad to learn from Professor Gilman's speech at the Leicester Conference, holds now an assured position as an international organ of liberal religious thought. We should be glad, also, to be assured that its circulation in this country was steadily increasing.

The December number opens with an article by M. Albert Réville on the Dreyfus Affair, telling how the writer, in common with many educated and liberal-minded Frenchmen, at first believing in the guilt of the accused, was led by irresistible evidence to the conviction of his innocence and of the great wrong that had been done, and tracing in a most interesting manner the subtle causes at the heart of that bitter controversy. Mr. M. A. Potter, of Dartmouth College, in the next article gives some quaint illustrations of the legendary story of Christ's childhood, the Rev. C. F. Dole writes on "Horace Bushnell and his Work for Theology," and Professor C. C. Everett contributes an article on "The Distinctive Mark of Christianity," which he finds not in any form of doctrine, but in a growing Christian life, differing from all other religions by its "larger completeness." Christianity, in Professor Everett's view, is "the religion that was revealed to the world through Jesus, and somewhat less purely through his apostles."

It has been wrapped in by forms and dogmas that men have believed were essential to its very being. They have had power because the life of Christianity was within them, though it was not from them. In these later days this life is beginning to show itself more clearly in its simple beauty, as it has been beheld now and then by some in every Church, and by some also who were not recognised as belonging to any Church. Let us rejoice in its light, and yield ourselves to be the instruments of its power.

There is, also, a useful article by Professor C. H. Leonard, of Tufts' College, on "Inductive Homiletics," which should be read by preachers and those interested in their training.

The March number, also, has an article which should be read by all who care for the maintenance of an efficient ministry—the article by Professor F. C. Porter, of Yale Divinity School, on "The Ideals of Seminaries." "The theological seminary," Professor Porter says, "should teach principles, not practice. It will become more practical just in proportion as it becomes more truly scientific." The practical work of the ministry is learnt by doing it, and by seeing competent men doing their work, rather than talking about it, which is a strong argument for the increase of curacies for students on leaving college. The seminary, it is further said, cannot create character and talent; it tests whether they are there, and should thus bar from the ministry those who are undoubtedly disqualified.

It is the Churches themselves that must attract men of high character and capacity for leadership into their service. By what they are and by what they do for the world, the Churches must make it evident to young men of talent and a right ambition that the ministry is a large office in which their manliness will have respect, and their capacity to work in and upon the world for good, abundant opportunity, large freedom and wide range.

The Rev. J. W. Chadwick contributes one of his delightful literary articles, on "John Donne, Poet and Preacher"; the Rev. Francis Tiffany writes on "William Morris, Craftsman and Socialist"; there is an unsympathetic study of St. Paul by Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton; and Miss E. G. Briggs, the very competent assistant of her father, Professor C. A. Briggs, writes on "The Date of the Epistle to the Galatians." To the opening article by the Rev. A. W. Jackson on "Dr. Martineau," we have already more fully referred. A good part of each number is devoted to valuable notices of books.

THE TEMPERANCE PROBLEM.

SIR,—Mr. Hargrove's surrender of his "firmly convinced" position as a moderate drinker, to become a convert to the principle and practice of total abstinence, is one to be respected for its motive, but is only to be welcomed in so far as it does not lead him and others to the mistaken conclusion, that in the total abstinence of the moderate drinker is to be found the chief instrument of temperance progress.

2. The temperance battle is now fought on these three lines: (1) total abstinence by the moderate drinker, (2) advocacy of direct veto on sale (only) in localities, and (3) amended administration of a continued monopoly. There is a fourth weapon in our temperance armoury which, if used, would be more effective than the combined three — the reduction and gradual supersession of the monopoly itself.

3. If total abstinence, direct veto, or care for amended administration, blind us to the unceasing activity which may be expected from monopolistic interests, we overlook the very grave fact that there is always going on a legalised stimulation of drinking, favoured by such enormous profits as only monopoly can create, and screened by the sinister influences which monopoly is sure to call into being.

4. A statement of the operations of monopoly in promotion of drunkenness is, perhaps, unsuited to your columns. I appeal to temperance workers to observe and think out for themselves how mischievous in working is the monopoly we complacently permit to flourish while we talk of pledges, veto, and amended administration of an unwise system best swept away altogether. What filth and impure water are to fever and cholera, monopoly is to drunkenness and excessive drinking. The intemperance effect follows by logical consequence the monopoly cause. We reap as we sow.

5. I am aware that I shall be thought too presumptuous and positive, but in this case an uncertain voice would be unfaithfulness to strong conviction. During ten years I lived with relatives in public houses, both tied and free. That and other circumstances led me to study the temperance problem on many sides, and compelled me to the conclusion that in these islands it is monopoly of sale which is far the worst foe to temperance.

6. Though unpledged, I virtually abstain, as being convenient, economical, certainly not unhealthy, and no self-denial; further, abstinence reduces the gains of the monopolist. There is no merit in abstinence on my part, nor on that of most abstainers. It is too small a matter for the boast of being "a stalwart." We have to remember that total abstinence has not been advocated by such great modern teachers as Matthew Arnold, Browning, Carlyle, Emerson, Mill, Ruskin, Herbert Spencer, and Tennyson. On the other hand, I submit that we decline on culpable indolence and ignorance when we nearly overlook and rarely mention the operations of monopoly in encouragement of drunkenness.

7. Most of our temperance organisations were originated in a period prior to the development and hardening of the monopoly. Their policies, if suited to the circumstances of fifty years ago, are unsuited now. These fossilised policies are, in the face of the changed facts, most unfortunate. They are not only inoperative against the counterworkings of monopoly, but bring on the religious life an undeserved reputation for want of wisdom.

8. I should be glad to see every abstainer a conscientiously-moderate drinker, and all talk of a roughshod and unreachable veto discontinued, if thereby attention were more focused on the calamitous drink monopoly, surely the worst public and social wrong of our time.

W. PARMENTER.

A CONVERT TO TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

SIR,—I had heard of Mr. Hargrove's speech at Liverpool, and I read his letter with much joy. The degree of it surprised me, and on reflection I found that it could not all be derived by sympathy from that which some people very dear to me would, I knew, take in Mr. Hargrove's conversion. I felt, on my own account, that here was a decision which might help, and could not hinder, the best hopes of the world.

Hitherto I have not been a total abstainer from alcoholic drinks. Sundry reasons, as I thought them, sophistries, as they now seem, kept me from joining the teetotalers. But on making the discovery to which I have referred I had, of course, but one way before me. An opportune appeal from a friend reached one just then, and my reply was an enlistment in the T.A. army.

The first duty which my decision lays on me is this plain avowal. The second seems to be an appeal to my fellow-ministers. I suggest to them the one point—you cannot very well be going wrong, and you may be doing right, if you become a teetotaler. Who will be third? E. W. LUMMIS.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Psalms of the West."

THE will of a man is his chief glory, if it go forth to prevail over wrong.

A strong will is above all to be desired, a will to defeat the powers of evil within us;

To make perfect equity between all men, and perfect judgment in all causes;

To crush the pride of our desires and make our souls the humble disciples of God;

To contend against every ill word that pleaseth a company, to oppose the cry of a multitude;

To drive the goodwill of princes before us like chaff, if the right offendeth their pleasure;

To consider riches as naught in comparison with honour, and large possessions as a trust for service to many;

To promote good at all times, and to work strenuously against sordid cares for self;

To set truth above comfort, and searching above creeds, and honesty towards man above fruitless observance of rites;

To pass through the fire every cherished belief and ceremony, and to go forth from a rich land into the wilderness;

To free our souls from material bondage, and to rise above the tempter that maketh all things easy;

To walk steadfastly in the difficult path, to consider deeply every argument, and to abandon the mischief we hastily championed;

To ponder the causes of distress, to follow poverty to its roots, to shun the temptation to give what will not cure;

To be kind towards differing opinion, and just towards the motives of enemies;

To seek patiently for the causes of hatred, to heal a rebellious people by the swift removal of wrong;

To hear even the foolish in their complaint, to spread truth among the guilty, to persuade the vile of their error;

To bring peace where we long for battle, reason where we would strike and conquer, and patience where impatience would save us;

To be as children of God, loving all, doing good to all, instructing all in the way of reason and grace,

Remembering that He is a Spirit, and that to us belongeth the power to grow into the breadth of heaven.

His thought is greater than space, His wisdom hath room for the aspirations of all time;

The day of judgment will come unto every soul that hath finished the task of life; a perfect conscience with perfect memory is the judgment of God.

OF all the arts sagacious dupes invent
To cheat themselves and gain the world's assent,
The worst is Scripture warped from its intent.—W. Cowper.

WE have it entirely in our own hands to determine the order of thought we entertain, and consequently the order of influences we attract, and are not mere willowy creatures of circumstance unless indeed we choose to be. In our mental lives we can either keep hold of the rudder, and so determine exactly what course we take, what points we touch, or we can fail to do this, and failing, we drift, and are blown hither and thither by every passing breeze.—R. W. Trine.

THE LARGER FAITH.

IN childhood I was bidden to receive
The book of Genesis as Revelation.
What God dictated man must fain believe—
And thus I gained my notions of Creation.

But studying Nature's ever open page,
Comparing it with Genesis, I saw
How great the discord; and my tender age
Grew conscious of inexorable law.

Then waged a conflict, fierce, despondent, long,
Till every rock and river seemed to hold
A mocking devil, hinting God was wrong,
And science must discredit what He told.

Till, strong in faith, I triumphed, and hugged close
My Moses whom God's Spirit deigned inspire;
And with this word slew every doubt that rose,
"Let God be true, and every man a liar!"

But ever reading, flowed my spirit out
In wonder and worship, that the world should show
So infinitely noble, till I shout
"The world is God's, be Genesis or no!"

And what of man's salvation, bound to stand
Or fall with that strange tale of Paradise?
Eve's sin, and Christ's redemption, and the grand Fantastic story of God's sacrifice?

Suppose the world, not fashioned at a word,
Slowly evolved by immanental will:
Is man the less God's son, Creation's lord,
That he was never made—is making still?

Though Reason ask some hundred million years
Where Fancy dreamt six thousand, more or less;
Is there less hope in penitential tears,
Less joy in Truth, less worth in Righteousness?

Is man unfallen, man the less in need
Of God and Christ, and Love, and Faith, and Hope?
I trow his weakness lacks a Father's lead,
A brother's sympathy, while as we grope

Through strange half-lighted vistas, opening fast
On our mistrustful, unaccustomed sight.
We move from darkness, though we cease, at last
To dream we fell to darkness out of light!

And while we read God's might in every star,
His love and righteousness in human hearts;
What need we marking these as secular,
And those as sacred, Places, Books, or Arts?

Let those who may their Revelation find,
In words no better than a man might write:
Mine be the impress of Eternal Mind
On a world worthy of the Infinite!

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

One day when Jesus was talking with his disciples and teaching them, he said to them: "A good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit, neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. For every tree is known by his own fruit. For of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes. A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil, for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh." If in a garden there are fruit trees, and the master finds when fruit-time comes that the fruit is not good, but has something the matter with it, he knows that there is something amiss with the tree, and that he must find out something to cure it: the poorness or badness of the fruit is the sign or expression of something wrong with the tree.

In the same way, if a little child or a baby is fretful and restless, sometimes an impatient little sister or brother will call it "naughty," and perhaps even give it a little shake or slap to teach it to be "good"; but a wise mother knows that if the little plant was all right the fruit and expression would be all right too, and that the baby's fretfulness is a sign of something amiss which the poor child cannot explain or express in any other way than by crying and fretting. So she looks deeper than the little fretful voice, just as the gardener looks deeper than the poor shabby fruit. He does not think that if he picks off the bad fruit the tree will be all right; and the mother does not think that if she stops that one little cry the child is all right. Both have patience—the gardener to cure the disease in the tree from which the bad fruit comes, and the mother to cure the trouble or pain in the child which makes it fretful.

The tree and the baby have only one way of expressing what is in them; but we are better off, for we have two—words and actions. It is fortunate, indeed, for us that it is so; else, what should we think, as we go along the streets, and hear boys and girls, men and women, using language not only rude and rough, but often wicked as well as vulgar? As words express what is inside, it is certainly true that "an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh." So that one is obliged to believe that people who use bad or rough or wicked words are expressing bad and rough and wicked things which are hiding inside; just as the tree that has something wrong in it brings out the evil in its fruit.

Stand near a crowd of noisy boys, quarrelling over their games, rude and selfish, standing in the way of people passing along the streets; listen to the vulgar talk, and the bad words they use; you would think, then, what an "evil treasure" there must be in their hearts that comes out so readily in their words. All at once, an old woman, very poor and helpless, comes creeping along, and looks feebly and wistfully across the street, as if afraid to cross. And one of the boys who had been noisiest and rudest and used the worst words of all, looks up and says, "Stand away, I say, and let the old lady pass"; and then he looks in her face and sees her looking timidly across the street, and in a moment he is by her side, and, holding her by the arm, he says, "All right, mum; never fear; I'll see you safe." If his words are rather rough they are kindly said, and the wickedness is gone. It was a "good treasure" in the boy's heart that found expression then, not an "evil treasure"; so the treasure in his heart was a mixed one; and respect for an old person, and pity for a weak and helpless one brought out the goodness instead of the rudeness and vulgarity that was in him.

Many a boy gets into the habit of using rude or bad language simply from the example of others; but he would not do it if the "good treasure" in his heart kept up a constant resistance to what is low and bad: if it did this, it would find expression in gentler and better language: "for of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." And just as in a tree or a person a disease spreads unless it is checked, so does a bad habit grow worse and worse, if not taken in hand; and there is no bad habit that is more catching or spreads faster than bad language. Do boys really think it "manly" to use bad words? If so, it can only be because they hear some men use them; but they do not hear all men use them; and it is not the rough or bad words that make or prove them men; for those who are truly manly would have the strength and courage to resist what they know to be bad. Then the lads say, "We only do what our companions do, and many of them are very jolly fellows." Is it the rudeness and bad language that makes them jolly fellows? or is it not rather that they are jolly fellows in spite of it? That boy who helped the old woman was a much nicer boy when he walked across the road with her, and far more manly than when he noisily quarrelled and used bad words with his companions.

And why should people catch up bad and rude language from those who use it? Why should they follow an example like this? It is no excuse to say "we only do what our companions do." Why should not you, if you know something better, set the example instead of follow one? Why should not you take the lead? In games children are always anxious to be first. "Me first; let me be in," you always hear, as they play. And if in games, why not in earnest? We can hardly guess how much one steady, good girl or boy may do to lead the way, if they have only strength and courage to be firm. Why should we all, like a foolish flock of sheep, run after the first sheep that starts, without once looking to see where he is going? "All we like sheep have gone astray."

If, instead of being born 1900 years ago in Palestine, Jesus had been born amongst you children in England; if he had been a boy amongst you boys, gone to school with you, played marbles and pegtops with you, and lived at some little carpenter's shop amongst us here, how do you suppose things would have gone with him? Would he have picked up bad language in the streets? Would he have spoken gently and nicely to his schoolmaster and rudely and coarsely to men and boys outside? Would he have been rough and impatient, and quarrelled to be first, and abused companions who won his marbles or fairly beat him in play? Would he have "only done as his companions did?" You know he would not. And why? Because the "good treasure" in his heart would never have consented to what he knew was not good; he would have had the firmness to be the leader against wrong, instead of the weakness to be the follower of bad leaders. And he would have felt, even when too young a boy to express it, that so far from rudeness and vulgarity being "manly," no man deserves the name who does not use his strength to help on the innocence and purity of others, and to defend the weak who would follow what is good if they only had the strength and the leader. To help others to do wrong is cowardly and unmanly—and unwomanly, too—for all this applies to girls and boys alike: it is quite as difficult for girls to control their tongues as for boys, and quite as necessary.

And I think one great reason why Jesus would have kept free from all those evils, even if he had lived amongst us now, is that he would have felt of God: "Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways; for there is not a word in my tongue, but lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether." If we, too, only felt and remembered that God is thus beside us always and "knows altogether" every word in our tongue, could we speak before him the rude or wicked words? Should we not pray at night and in the morning, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting"?

Gertrude Martineau.

The sixty-eighth assembly of the Congregational Union has been held at the Memorial Hall during the week. On Monday the election to the chairmanship of the Union was effected, after a third ballot. The three possible candidates were Dr. Caleb Scott, Dr. Joseph Parker, and Dr. P. T. Forsyth. In the two first ballots Dr. Scott headed the list, but on the third ballot the majority of Dr. Forsyth's supporters having apparently cast their votes for Dr. Parker, he was elected by 418 votes out of 795, and will thus for a second time occupy the chair of honour in his denomination. It was reported that promises for the Congregational Twentieth Century Fund amounted to £475,000, so that the half-million aimed at was well within sight. On the subject of the war two appeals had been received, one from the Natal Congregational Union, the other from 414 Dutch ministers, from opposite points of view, and the Committee and the Union refrained from expressing any opinion. Mr. Carvell Williams, as the last chairman of the Union in the present century, devoted his presidential address to a retrospect of Nonconformity in the Nineteenth Century. He pointed out that whereas in 1808 Independents, Baptists and Presbyterians could reckon up only 2,000 congregations, a voluntary return made last year by the Church of England and ten of the Evangelical Nonconformist bodies showed that since 1857 there had been an increase in the Church of England of 1,631,013 sittings, and on the other side an increase of 3,401,124 sittings. Other signs of vitality and progress in Nonconformity were noted. As to the Free Church Federation, while not inclined to speak of it in the inflated language of some of its founders, it had undoubtedly great possibilities.

OLD TESTAMENT REVELATION.

THE series of historical articles tracing the progress of Old Testament studies throughout the century, for which we are indebted to the Rev. W. ADDIS, of Manchester College, Oxford, is completed in our present issue, and we have vividly presented to our view the services rendered by a genuine criticism of the ancient literature gathered up in the Old Testament, and the immeasurable benefit to religious faith derived from a knowledge of the true order of the development of the religion of Israel.

Towards the close of his final article Mr. ADDIS says that "not a few in the face of critical difficulties have made shipwreck of their faith," and it is no doubt painfully true that the old claims of verbal inspiration made for the Bible, and the supposed necessity of accepting as fact divinely given the whole of its statements, and as righteous the whole of its presentment of GOD and His dealings with men, have been among the most fruitful causes of unbelief among Christian people. It has lifted a dreadful burden from the reverent and humble heart, that we are now able to recognise in the Old Testament the record of a growing religious life, which passed step by step from very crude beginnings up to a lofty spiritual faith, instinct with righteousness as the power of the living GOD—a religious life which, out of the seeds of prophetic inspiration and a piety found nowhere else throughout the world, in spite of many depressing and perverting influences, came at last to its perfection, for the enlightenment of mankind, in JESUS of Nazareth.

Criticism has in fact given back the Bible to a living religious faith; and just because we are now free to criticise and heartily to reprobate some aspects of the moral life even of "the chosen people," in the earlier stages of its development, and can simply set aside those earlier representations of GOD, which we feel to be unworthy of Him, who is to be worshipped in spirit and in truth, we are able to recognise, not in blind obedience to tradition or from any dogmatic compulsion, but with clear spiritual conviction, the progress of Divine revelation as it is recorded in the Old Testament and completed in the New.

Mr. ADDIS speaks of this revelation as "unique and supernatural" in its character, and by quotation from other distinguished scholars, seems to adopt, or rather to share their belief as to "the supernatural origin of Hebrew prophecy," and the special revelation of which Israel was the subject, "fulfilled in that absolutely unique revelation bestowed upon us in our Lord JESUS CHRIST." For our own part, while sharing in the essential faith which gives rise to such expressions, we should hesitate to use the term "supernatural" in this connection, because of the large amount of misconception attaching to it as to the actual method of Divine revelation. We shrink from any attempt to draw a sharp distinction between "natural" and "supernatural" in the moral and spiritual life of the world. It is the supreme glory of our faith to be convinced that GOD is present in our life to-day as "supernaturally" as He was in the life of JESUS himself, and that the revelation which comes to us in the conviction of spiritual truth is as "supernatural" as when it throbbed with so much loftier power in the Master's heart. The revelation of Divine truth in prophet and psalmist of the Old Testament is indeed unique, because it stands alone among the historical religions of the world, as purest and loftiest of all, by witness of the Spirit within, manifestly divine; and so also with the yet more perfect revelation in JESUS, completing the ideal of the true life of the children of GOD. When we learn the secret of his life, "the Spirit beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of GOD; and if children, then heirs, heirs of GOD and joint-heirs with CHRIST."

That revelation is "special" and "absolutely unique," because there is but one JESUS, and we can think of none other as "the Chief of faithful souls." But the faith to which he leads us is invincible, not because we have in him a channel of Divine communication separate and different in kind from all others, but because of the inward witness, and that in him which answers to the deepest needs and purest aspirations of our nature. In the life of JESUS and the spirit of his religion, we see most clearly the Divine purpose in humanity; with him we are satisfied and strong against the world, because we know, not from any outward telling but from inward and most joyful assurance, that this life is of GOD. Thus we may truly say that through the long centuries before JESUS came and his grace and truth were revealed to the world, "the whole history of mankind was looking forward to him," for this was the manhood, this was the true spirit of the child of GOD, which from the first was intended in the purpose of the Eternal; only in that spirit could the true strength and blessedness of life be attained. And it should not be forgotten that the growing sense of need, the many disappointments of national hope and personal ideal, were Divine revelation, showing what was not the truth, just as much as the showing of what alone could satisfy and the perfect lineaments of truth in the human soul as child of GOD.

To JESUS the prophets bear witness, not by any particular foretelling according to the old system of evidences, but because in the religion of their own day they spoke the word of Divine truth, which was ever reaching forward to the truer light and the more perfect manhood, and when JESUS came, what they had hoped for and aspired after, in the spirit of a true life with GOD, was attained. And no less truly may it be said that to JESUS other great teachers, in religions quite apart from the history of Israel, bear witness, and in them also Divine revelation is to be found. For it is a strange faith indeed that can suppose that the human race for long ages was left without GOD in the world, except for one small tribe of men to whom the growing light was vouchsafed. What was true and helpful in those others we feel to be of GOD, no less than in the Hebrew prophets; they bear witness through what is good, and through what falls short of the more perfect goodness manifest in CHRIST. It is because the "education of the human race" can be, and must be, regarded as a whole that the preeminence of the Hebrew prophets stands out so clearly, and bears witness with such kindling power to the truth of GOD.

The revelation of the Old Testament comes home to us with its true significance and inspiration when it is clearly understood that it is of life, which lives in us to-day, and when, in the endeavour to be faithful to the duties of our day, we come to know what it is to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with our GOD. Through present faithfulness alone, and through the hunger after better faithfulness, which we know can be attained, can we truly be convinced that the past is sacred and filled with the Divine Presence; so only does the glorious strength of the old prophets flow into our life, and become again a power that makes for righteousness.

THE truest, surest way in which we can serve our fellow-townsmen is not so much to do anything for them, but to be the very truest, purest, noblest beings we know how.—Frances Power Cobbe.

UNITARIAN AND TRINITARIAN:

A THEOLOGICAL EIRENICON.

By the Rev. C. E. Beeby, B.D., Vicar of Yardley Wood, and Author of "Creed and Life."

I.

1. To pronounce a man a Unitarian is to awaken a feeling of abhorrence in the souls of many of my clerical brethren in the Church of England. Nevertheless, I am convinced that many modern Unitarians are far nearer orthodox belief than not a few ardent professors of orthodox Churchmanship; and the time appears to be now ripe when it is possible to make an appeal for mutual understanding. To that end I now offer, in all humility, what may be regarded as a kind of theological eirenicon.

To this day the Latin or Western Church is regarded by the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church as heretical. The Athanasian Creed in so far interprets the mind of the Orthodox Church in declaring the Catholic faith to be identical with the doctrine of the Trinity. None of the questions which were raised by Augustine, and which were of supreme interest to the Latin mind, are determined by the early Creeds. The whole distinctive system of Latin theology is, indeed, little consistent with the Creed of the Orthodox Church. While nominally adhering to the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity, the mental attitude of the "Catholic," his view of God and of the world, and of God's relation to the world, his scheme of salvation, and his whole system of Church life, is incompatible with a genuine acceptance of the Athanasian doctrine.

And what is said of "Catholics" applies equally to the Tractarians and their spiritual successors. Their doctrines and practices are more in harmony with some form of Arianism than with Athanasianism. The Greek doctrine of the relation of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit is expressed in the Nicene Creed, "Who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified." In the Latin interpretation of the doctrine, as the Athanasian Creed asserts, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is each separately to be worshipped and glorified as the One God. "We are compelled by the Christian verity to acknowledge every Person by Himself (sigillatim) to be God and Lord." As Newman declared, "Each one Person by Himself is the one Personal God in the fulness of His Being and Attributes, as if the other two were unknown."* The difference is radical, and involves the whole difference of Latin and Greek theology. When each one Person by Himself is worshipped as the One God, as if the other two were unknown, there cannot fail to arise a conception of some real difference in the functions, and then in the character, of the Persons, and the Trinity becomes in the popular mind Tritheism. Hence the interpretation of the Atonement which represents Christ as offering Himself to appease the wrath of the Father. The Son is the Saviour in delivering man from the Hell to which the race, apart from the Covenant, is doomed. The priest will offer up Christ, as the Holy Sacrifice, "for all our sins and offences" and "for the saving health of the faithful, living and departed."

The Divinity of the Son of God is approached from the side of the deified man, as the old Roman conceived Deity, and the Latins never rise to the idea of the One Eternal Incarnate, the Universal Life in whom all things consist. God is normally absent from the world; He intervenes on occasion by miracle, and administers grace through the media of supernatural persons, places, and things.

2. Now if we refer to the New Testament we shall not to-day expect to find there the full and mature doctrine of the Trinity clearly laid down. Newman avowed that the revelation of the doctrine of the Trinity was a gradual revelation. He abandoned the argument of proof from Scripture and placed the source of our knowledge of the true doctrine in the authority of Church Councils.* Briefly, the Synoptics with the Acts, in accordance with the Latin mind, declare the Divinity of Christ from the point of view of the deified man, while the fourth Gospel, in harmony with Greek thought, is based on the conception of the One Universal Eternal, and exhibits Him realising Himself in time and manifesting Himself through sensuous phenomena. The one starts from the concrete sensuous fact, and the other from abstract thought and the ideal world. The Pauline doctrine, again, of the Spiritual Man, of Heaven, is clearly distinguished from the doctrine of the Logos of the Johannine Gospel. The attempt to create a theology out of the various elements of the doctrine of the Christ, furnished by the Synoptics, the fourth Gospel, and the writings of St. Paul, is as little rational as the former practice, now abandoned, of exhibiting harmonies of the four gospel-records. No one of any critical aptitude will to-day assume the childish task of constructing such a theological mosaic. There were, it is generally recognised, theological views in the growing Church, and there has been development of some kind and character. The Catholic Church of the New Testament Scriptures embraces different doctrines of the Christ, because in the early Church faithfulness to Christ was not identified with an intellectual assent to theological doctrine. Converts brought with them into their new religious home their own mental aptitudes and theological framework, whether derived from Latin or Greek, or the Rabbinical school of thought. The assumption that the several writers of the New Testament must all teach the same Christology, is on a par with the assumption that the several writings of the Old Testament must be made to harmonise because they are contained in one volume. There is no grotesqueness to which some ecclesiastical minds will not abandon themselves in favour of such à priori theories.

3. The Apostles' or Roman Creed is quite compatible with a profession of Arianism. Here the doctrine of the Trinity is by no means matured. The Father is represented as the Fountain and Source, the Almighty, the Maker, and Jesus Christ is differentiated from the One Almighty as our Lord, who is declared to be such by his birth in time of a Virgin. There is no clear assertion of the Eternity and equality of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as the One God. The impression is of a distinct and separate God. In the Nicene Creed the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity is better guarded and declared. But the logical and mature doctrine is that of the decree of the fourth Lateran Council, C. 2, whose terms no longer allow misunderstanding. Whereas even among the most ardent professors of orthodoxy the Father is commonly made the ground or substance, and the Son and Holy Ghost in a sense derivative; in the mature and logical statement of the Trinity, the Father, no less than the Son and the Holy Spirit, is the One God manifested to and in consciousness. Behind the "Persons" there is, according to the decree of the Council, a thing (res) not begetting nor begotten, nor proceeding, incomprehensible and ineffable, substance, essence, or divine nature, which alone is principle of the Universe. This incomprehensible and ineffable Ultimate, which neither begets nor is begotten, nor proceeds, is truly Father which begets, Son which is begotten, and Holy Spirit which proceeds.

4. The question now arises, what is the meaning of the term "Person"? It is only natural that the average Churchman should fail to distinguish the word "Person," as a theological and technical term, from its usage in common speech. In a recent controversy, even a Doctor of Divinity, of some fame among High Churchmen, defined the "Person" of the Trinity, in what he called "the scientific language of Christian theology," as an ego. "Whatever the word 'Person' may include as applied to God, it includes more, not less, than its contents as applied to man. Ego is of the essence of personality."* This is sheer Tritheism. There is, of course, no warrant whatever, for such an interpretation in the definition of Councils. Unitarianism is a very proper and necessary protest against this popular misunderstanding of orthodox doctrine. "I am afraid," says Dr. Rashdall, "that most people—at least in their orthodox moments, when they are trying to realise to themselves the doctrine of the Holy Trinity—think of the three Persons as three distinct beings, three consciousnesses, three minds, three wills. Nothing less than that could be implied if by Person were meant anything like what is meant by it in ordinary discourse. I trust I have said enough to show that, whatever be the exact shade of meaning which this highly technical expression bore to those who first introduced it, it certainly did not mean that."† "The word persona, as used in the Athanasian Creed," says Professor V. G. Allen, "carried at first the meaning of function or office, nearly equivalent to the Greek Πρόσωπον Thus in early English it became 'parson.' But the modern English 'person' is equivalent to an individual, and this is very remote from the original Latin persona, and its use in the Creed accounts in some measure for the popular tritheistic view of the Deity."‡ Newman defined "Person" as something "more than a mere character, yet less than an individual intelligent being."* The following presents a brief account from the side of metaphysics of the relation of "persons" and "substance":—"'Person' was equivalent to subsistence or hypostasis—that which goes to complete the idea of Substance. Subsistence was a mode (Divines would say distinction) added to the single Nature and constituting a suppositum along with it. The three 'Persons' are three hypostases or subsistencies, and they are modes or distinctions which are necessary to complete the existence of the singular Nature or Substance in the Athanasian Creed. Hence while the distinctions are separate, the complete idea of Deity requires them to make it complete. 'Substance' in the Creed requires the 'Subsistencies' or 'hypostases' or 'Persons' to complete the full idea of God."

5. A question was put to me, in a recent controversy, which was intended to be very searching and critical: "Had Jesus a human person as well as a human nature? In other words, was there a time when Jesus did not personally exist?" The trap was laid to catch me in an assertion of technical heresy, since, according to the Athanasian Creed, Christ was not a human person at all. I did not fall into it. But the answer may be given, I think, in plain English, in a quite unambiguous and explicit statement, without fear of being accused even of technical heresy. Christ was, according to the Athanasian Creed, "of a reasonable Soul and human flesh subsisting," and the records of the life of Christ bear out the truth of that statement. He was subject to the natural appetites of man; He experienced all human feelings; He shunned pain, physical and mental; He manifested all human emotions; He had sympathy with all the life of human kind, which implies that there were in Him all the elements of human life. It is impossible to point out that He was deficient in any one of those qualities and attributes which constitute human personality. Now that is what we commonly call a human person, the word "person" being an abstract general term used to denote everyone of a whole class of beings constituted generically by those aggregates of qualities which all have in common. The very Councils, to which appeal is made for the distinction of human nature and human person, declare the real human personality of Christ. Apollinarius, who denied to Christ pneuma or nous, the "reasonable Soul" of the Athanasian Creed, was condemned by the second Œcumenical Council, that of Constantinople. If, then, the ascription of human personality is condemned nominally by the third Œcumenical Council, that of Ephesus, and the fourth Œcumenical Council, that of Chalcedon, the contrary doctrine, which denies human personality to Christ, is really condemned by the second Œcumenical Council.

It is evident, then, that the word "person" is used, theologically, in some technical sense. In the common usage of the word Jesus was a human person, but in the technical language of theology He was not a human person. What it is which Jesus does not possess, the absence of which in Him precludes Him from being called in the technical language of Theology a human person, I leave to those to determine who place any value on the distinction. But the refusal of Church Councils to apply the technical theological term "person" to Christ, as human, ought not to prevent us from recognising that one who eats and drinks, who is weary and sleeps, who evinces all human emotions, being "of a reasonable soul and human flesh," can only be verbally distinguished from a human person, and in the common understanding and common speech of men is a human person.

To this solution of the question we seem to be bound. For what is the consequence, if that solution be refused? Should it be affirmed, on the contrary, that Jesus is not a human person, not only theologically but in the ordinary sense of the word "person," what becomes of Christ our Saviour? You have Something, which is more than a mere character and less than an individual intelligent Being, united to a human nature. Christ is now not an individual intelligent being, human or divine. The one Christ is Something less than an individual intelligent being. Our Saviour is dissolved into a series of mental abstractions, an aggregate of qualities, without any concrete unity.

6. What is the inference we have to draw on the whole subject? It is that in our attempt to define the relation of the Divine and the human in the Personality of Jesus Christ we have got beyond our depth. As Prebendary Row says, respecting the assertions of the Athanasian Creed, "It is impossible for us to know whether they are true or false, because the mode of the union of the Divine and the human in a single personality is a thing which stands outside the entire range of human experience. Respecting it, therefore, that experience can affirm nothing. Nor do the Scriptures tell us anything about the mode in which the Incarnation was effected."* To the same purport are the words of Canon Basil Wilberforce: "Obviously no mortal understanding can dare to crystallise into a literal proposition the mystic miracle of the Incarnation; no man can define the exact relation between Jesus and the Father dwelling in Him."† Very apposite, it seems to me, is the plea of Canon Carter, the venerable leader of the Catholic party in the Church of England, on an analogous doctrine. Affirming the Real Presence in the Sacrament he declares his inability to subscribe to the definition of "Transubstantiation," and he bases his refusal on this ground:—

It seems to me to be going too far with the hope of explaining what is really unexplainable. For how can we explain the union of the heavenly and the earthly, the invisible and the visible, the immaterial and the material? I hold firmly to the original belief of the mystical union, through consecration of our Lord's blessed Body and Blood and the elements we hold in our hands, which through our prayers the Holy Spirit is believed to have accomplished. This is the truth held firmly by the early undivided Church, and to this the Church of England clings, without thinking it possible to explain what must ever be mysterious.‡

Now this appears to me to apply in every particular equally, and I think I may say a fortiori to the question of the union of the Divine and the human, the heavenly and the earthly, in the nature of Christ. The union must ever be mysterious; it is really unexplainable.

Dean Mansel's protest recurs to mind in view of the serious attempt by some in the Church of England—incredible as it might have been thought—to re-impose the yoke of the old Scholastic Realism. "It tells us," he says, "that our belief in the doctrine of God manifest in the flesh, indispensably depends upon our acceptance of the Realist theory of the nature of universal notions. Philosophy and Theology alike protest against such an outrage upon the claims both of Reason and Revelation, as is implied in this association of one of the most fundamental truths of the Christian Faith with one of the most questionable speculations of mediæval metaphysics. . . . Neither Christian truth nor philosophical inquiry can be advanced by such a system as this, which revives and sanctifies, as essential to the Catholic Faith, the forgotten follies of Scholastic Realism, and endangers the cause of Religion, by seeking to explain its greatest mysteries by the lifeless forms of a worn-out controversy."* The common faith is that there are unique relations of the Divine and the human in the personality of Christ. He who says more may utter sounds; he will reach no further in thought. It is sometimes said of those who refuse to define, or rather to enunciate verbal affirmations respecting the relation of the Divine and the human, that they make Christ a mere man. The argument begs the question. It is one which could only be made by one who is immeshed in the modes of thought of Latin theology. The Latin view of man is of a being estranged from God, cut off from the Divine life except by the intervention of a supernatural person, the priest, and of a grace administered by the material channels of the Sacraments. In Greek theology man is a being with the life of God abiding in him by his fundamental constitution as man. No one who has entered into the Athanasian doctrine of the Incarnation can possibly say "mere man," in the derogatory sense, as though man had no kinship with the Divine nature. In Latin thought the life of God has to be imparted; in Greek thought it has to be awakened and nourished. In Latin thought Christ is "a new physical creation," and the new physical germ is transmitted to man by sacramental channels; in Greek thought Christ is the true Representative of the race of "Adam, the Son of God."

(To be concluded.)

SIGNOR BRACCIFORTI writes to us from Milan on May 7:—"Our good friend, Miraglia, the Bishop-elect, who allowed me—a Unitarian—to preach from his pulpit, was yesterday, in my presence and before a crowded congregation, consecrated Bishop in the Oratorio San Paolo of Piacenza, by a duly ordained Roman Catholic Archbishop, Monsignor Villatte. The police had allowed the people to come into the Oratorio only one by one, in hopes that the Oratorio would be half empty, but it was overcrowded for all that."

DR. MARTINEAU ON THE PLACE OF REVERENCE IN MORAL LIFE.

EXPOUNDERS of Dr. Martineau's ethical and religious teaching usually represent him as holding that our knowledge of God through Conscience is nothing but an inference from the fact of moral authority as experienced. There is no real or vital union between God and the soul; we merely infer the existence of God, which thus becomes a theory to explain certain facts. There is no doubt that numerous passages might be quoted from Dr. Martineau's writings in support of the opinion that this was his complete and final view. It is certain, however, that there are other passages which suggest an important modification of this view; and the nature of this modification I wish to make clear. It will be found to have an important bearing on the discussion which recently took place in these columns, as to the relative importance of a Prophet's moral doctrine and the power of his personality.

We may refrain from the attempt to form any idea of the present relation between God and the human personality; but if we do not refrain from it, we must either regard man as a detached and "insulated" being, or regard him as organically united to God. This means not only that the life of God flows into man's deepest life; it means that man's deepest life is part of the life of God. The finite person is in as close union with, and draws energy as continually from, the Divine Life, as a member of a living body does from the life of the whole.

From this point of view, Dr. Martineau's statement, that an insulated nature cannot be a seat of authority at all, appears in a new light. To be conscious of moral authority is to be conscious of imperfection, and we could not be this unless we had within us an absolute standard by which we judge ourselves. This suggests that we are not insulated or detached personalities because the obligatory Ideal of which we are dimly conscious is the very presence of the Divine in us.

Now there are passages where Dr. Martineau does more than suggest this view. Thus he speaks of the relation between "the moral consciousness and the Divine authority" as being "one, not so much of inference, as of identification; the ideas overlapping and being entwined together as functions of the same conception" ("Types," ii. 235). Again: "This revelation of authority, this knowledge of the better, this inward conscience, this moral ideality—call it what you will—is the presence of God in man" ("Seat of Authority," 105). Still more explicitly, he speaks of our ethical knowledge of God as, not an inference from the moral consciousness, but a truer insight into what the moral consciousness verily is: "When conscience was found to be inseparably blended with the Holy Spirit, ... the cold obedience to a mysterious necessity was exchanged for the allegiance of personal affection. And this is the true emergence from the darkness of ethical law to the tender light of the life divine. The veil falls from the shadowed face of moral authority, and the directing love of the all-holy God shines forth" (Ibid., 75). But the root of the matter is reached in understanding that what we call "the recognition of conscience as the voice of God" is really the transformation of the sense of moral authority into Reverence. Dr. Martineau's profoundly suggestive account of this change is so striking that I do not resist the temptation to quote it in full.

The essence of the change is that in our consciousness of moral authority we are aware of the moral Ideal simply as something which ought to be but is not; we reverence it when we are aware of it as actually realised—and then it comes home to us with a personal claim far superior in vividness and effect to any "categorical imperative" or any moral doctrine. The first stage of Reverence arises when we see a higher goodness realised in another human life. Dr. Martineau says:—

> The posture of mind which I describe as Reverence cares for right actions not simply as good phenomena, but as functions of pure, of faithful, of self-devoted, of lofty character. Not content to rest with the fruits, it presses on to the lovely or stately nature that bore them. And in thus passing from them to their producing source, the feeling itself undergoes a change. In place of an approbation which looks with complacency down, it becomes a homage which looks reverently up, and finds itself in presence, not of a definite thing done, but of a living doer, the cause of it and of indefinite other possibilities of nobleness; and so it is transferred from the level of ethical satisfaction to the plane of personal affection and aspiration. Till this change takes place, there is hardly any sacred element in the ideas of right. The moralities of conduct occupy the human and civic platform; but even in our relations with each other, some other light—call it poetic or call it divine—dawns upon the heart, when the revelations of some pathetic experience, or the disclosures of some rare biography, have opened to us the interior of a tender and strenuous soul, and kindled the heights above us with a fresh glory.
> I have spoken thus far of Reverence in its direction upon persons; distinguishing it from simple approbation in this—that in approbation we look to the particular act, with praise of its inward spring as compared with its tempting rival; while Reverence looks through and past the act to the type of character which it expresses, as compared with the relative weakness of our own. In order to take this outward direction upon objective goodness, the sentiment must, however, have had a prior stage of experience. For that inward disposition and character in another, upon which it now fixes, is nothing that can be seen or heard or touched; its presence before us is learnt by suggestion, by outward signs, of language, look, and act, which, we are aware, have but one interpretation. We read him by the key of sympathy, and what we attribute to him is known to us by its gleams and movements within ourselves. There it is that we have learnt the feeling that is due to it; that it has looked upon us from above; that it has spoken to us in tones that lift us towards it. . . . The call at once carries our eye up; thence the authority descends; and instead of passing like coins of exchange, between men that make them and men that take them, it lies upon each, it lies upon all; it has the grasp of a moral unity, the range of a moral universality; it is the overflow of Infinite Perfection into the finite mind.

This, says Dr. Martineau, is the final revelation of conscience, the issue of its full development; and he proceeds:—

> Thus, within our own consciousness, we find the same difference which was observable in the appreciation of others, between simply moral approbation and the feeling of Reverence. The latter cannot express itself without resorting, in the notice of affection and character, to language more than ethical, and plainly crossing the boundary into the field of Religion. It lives in the presence of souls that are holy, of dispositions that are heavenly, of tempers that are saintly, of Love that is Divine. ("Types," ii. 223 ff.)

It is, therefore, not enough to say that "over a free and living person nothing short of a free and living person can have authority." What has authority must be more than the dictate of a free and living person; it must be a principle of life which is more than merely due to his personality, but is revealed by him because it is realised in his character. Through being his Real, it becomes revealed to us—if we fall short of it—as our Ideal. It is this that renders the function of a Mediator, Uplifter, Inspirer, possible; "when we see in another the victory that shames our own defeat, and are caught up by an enthusiasm for some realised heroism or sanctity, the authority of right and the beauty of holiness come home to us as an appeal literally Divine" ("Seat of Authority," 652.) Thus it is that other souls, going beyond our attainments, but not beyond our possibilities, first call Reverence into life. But they do so because the manifestation of realised goodness without awakens Reverence for the absolute, universal goodness which is or may be revealed within. When this happens, Reverence is passing into its highest stage, where—when Reason has grown deep enough to interpret it—it becomes nothing less than an apprehension of the indwelling God.

> "Even independently of actual or visible heroes or saints on whom Reverence may fix when they are present, it finds for itself the means of exercise; it goes forth in faith upon invisible objects, and discerns, behind the veil of the actual, a better and a higher before which it humbles itself with cries of dependence and adoration," ("Types," ii. 262.) When this happens, our aspiration after goodness which ought to be, becomes the inspiration of Goodness which already is, in the deepest sense of the word; a Divine Life of Goodness, which is real all through our life of change, struggle, and growth; a Life on which our personal life is vitally dependent, and which is waiting, with all the might of its Reality, to flow gently into the wavering will and uplift the drooping resolves to the heights of a nobler constancy.

We may not often pass with clear consciousness into this stage of Reverence; but the great variations in self-knowledge are familiar to all, and what is a matter of the most intimate experience is often far from being a matter of clear discernment. This is why we need the Mediator, revealing through his life higher objects for our reverence. Hence the vast importance of social life as a means of Divine revelation; not merely the organised institutions of civilisation, but "society" as a common life of thought and feeling animating its members and affording them insight into one another's real being: "a concrete though spiritual form of life, penetrating and partly constituting all persons belonging to it; so that only as fractions of it do they become human integers themselves" ("Types," ii. 403). With profound truth a recent writer has said, "We must be well grounded in Humanity before we can study Divinity to any good purpose"; because only as we become aware, with both a rational and a reverential appreciation, of the degrees of worth in human character, can we attain to insight into the being of God. S. H. MELLONE.

BAZAAR ECHOES.

THE London Bazaar, held last week in the interest of the District Unitarian Society, proved, as our report would show, a most gratifying success. The Fund of £12,000, which was aimed at, seems now to be fully assured, and serious responsibilities of fresh and vigorous work are thus laid upon the managers, who will be appointed to hold and administer the trust. It was announced on Saturday evening by Mr. Frank Preston, as Treasurer, that when the Bazaar opened promises of donations had been received amounting to £10,169 11s. 4d. The takings at the Bazaar on the three successive days were £1,329 16s. 11d., £632 18s. 3d., £841 2s. 1d., giving a total of receipts £12,973 8s. 7d., and there was still more to come in, so that although the expenses must naturally have been heavy, there need be no doubt as to the final result.

AFTER three full days of hard work—indeed for the stall-holders and their helpers, probably five hard days—one might have expected that everyone would rest and be thankful; but on Friday evening the Effra Choral Union gave a concert in the Crown Room, by no means neglected by lovers of good music, and on Saturday evening a final conversazione and Cinderella dance took place, which was very largely attended. The programme of the Friday evening concert included S. C. Taylor's cantata Hiawatha's Wedding Feast and Villiers Stanford's The Revenge (with Tennyson's words), besides some miscellaneous items, including part songs by the Effra Choral Union, songs by Miss Keating and Mr. Braxton Smith, and violin solos by Mr. Josef Bláha. Mr. John Harrison conducted, and the concert gave a great deal of pleasure.

THE central interest of Saturday's conversazione was the presentation to Mrs. Odgers of the portrait of Dr. Blake Odgers, painted by Mr. W. Savage Cooper. The dancing in the King's Hall, to the music of the Blue Hungarian Band, was evidently greatly enjoyed, and during the evening a programme of music in two parts was also rendered in the Crown Room by a number of friends. At half-past nine the chair was taken in the Crown Room by Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., and the presentation of the portrait was made by Mr. David Martineau. In opening the proceedings, the Chairman called upon Mr. Frank Preston, who expressed his regret that Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, the senior treasurer, was not present to make the gratifying announcement he had to make, since to him it was largely due that any bazaar had been held at all. Mr. Preston then announced the financial result, which we have given above, and added a warm expression of thanks to friends in the country, who had so generously helped in that effort, contributing some £1,200 to the donations, while the Manchester Stall at the Bazaar had already produced over £400, and the Welsh Stall £84, as well as £60 in donations.

MR. DAVID MARTINEAU then presented the portrait, which bore the following inscription:—

Presented by subscription to Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, as a mark of personal esteem and in grateful appreciation of invaluable services rendered by herself and her husband, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, LL.D., Q.C., in connection with the London Unitarian Bazaar. May, 1900.

It was, he said, a most gratifying and pleasing duty to present to Mrs. Odgers, one of the indefatigable secretaries of that admirably arranged and most successful Bazaar, the portrait of her husband, to whom was due in chief measure the initiation of the idea and the energetic conduct and leadership of the Bazaar. Without his cheerful and infectious optimism they could hardly have overcome the early discouragements and cold-shoulderings the project received; but Dr. Odgers was determined that the somewhat faint-hearted London Unitarians should again learn what they, with the kindly help of many country friends, could do when sufficiently roused to try. Dr. Odgers did rouse them, and the result they had seen. That excellent and speaking likeness was at once the outcome of the grateful feelings the numerous subscribers entertained to the genial Chairman of the Bazaar Committee and his universally popular wife, to both of whom the success of the Bazaar was so largely indebted, but also of the talent and generosity of Mr. Savage Cooper, whose contribution to the Bazaar Fund was the subscription raised for the picture. Mr. Martineau then unveiled the portrait, presenting it on behalf of the subscribers, with the hope that it would be to Mrs. Odgers an agreeable memento. He afterwards handed to her a book containing the list of the subscribers.

MRS. ODGERS, in gratefully accepting the gift, made humorous reference to the Bazaar as her youngest child, who at first had been difficult to rear, and for whose benefit some friends had tried what cold water would do; but soon he showed more vigour, and grew to such proportions that at last he arrived at the King's Hall in twenty or thirty vans, and the universal cry was that the stalls were not large enough. Of him and his big twin brother, "The Fund," Mr. James Beard was to be regarded as the grandfather. They had all worked hard together, and were very thankful for the success they had achieved. She paid a warm tribute to the good work done from the first by their organising secretary, Mr. Edwards, to the wonderful patience and tact with which he had grappled with all the tiresome details, and concluded by presenting a basket of flowers to Mrs. Wooding, president of the stalls committee. Dr. Blake Odgers, in responding to a call from the Chairman, said his wife had replied for them both, and added, laughingly, "Besides, I must be silent to-night—my likeness is speaking." Mr. W. H. TALBOT (Town Clerk of Manchester) then moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, to Mr. Martineau, and to the artist. This was seconded by Mr. Arthur W. Sharpe, and Mr. Savage Cooper responded. During the evening the artist received many congratulations on his work.

LOOKING back upon the crowded days of the Bazaar, it becomes very clear how much of the pleasure of that great gathering of friends was due to the admirable management of the Hall sub-committee, concerning which one may echo the words of the Daily News, that the arrangements reflected the greatest credit on the organising committee. Among the visitors to the Bazaar were, on the first day, Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, on the second day Mr. Clay MacCauley, both of whom, from India and Japan, were on their way to Boston; and on the third day Professor N. P. Gilman, of Meadville, who, during the present term, is lecturing at Manchester College, Oxford.

MRS. E. H. MORTON, hon. sec. of the Postal Mission stall, writes to thank the numerous Postal Mission friends, who contributed so much to the success of the Bazaar. The amount realised at the P.M. stall was £53 10s. 9d., including donations. This working for a common cause, Mrs. Morton adds, has brought friends into closer touch and sympathy with one another, and even those who are far from any church where they can worship in spirit and in truth, and consequently feel themselves isolated, may have the satisfaction of knowing that they have helped others to the enjoyment of that great blessing.

MRS. PERCY PRESTON also writes to thank very cordially all who sent contributions to the Flower Stall.

MRS. BLAKE ODGERS, as hon. sec., writes from The Garth, North Finchley, N.:—"A small parcel containing two purchases was left at the Country Goods stall by a lady one afternoon last week. There is no name or address on it. Will the purchaser write to me, describing the contents, and tell me where to send it?"

THE Rev. T. E. M. Edwards writes from Essex Hall:—

A few articles were found at the Bazaar last week. If those friends who lost anything will kindly send me a description of their missing property, I may, perhaps, be able to restore it to its rightful owner.

MISS JENNETT HUMPHREYS writes from 5, Oak-grove, Cricklewood, N.W., that she has found an early-worked baby's cap on the floor of the Loan Collection room, and that the owner might apply to her.

THE "Book of the Bazaar" was illustrated not only by portraits and other pictures, but also by mottoes taken from authors of "Unitarian, or 'kindred' sympathies." In the list of stalls, under Manchester, we read:—"I received from Manchester what deserves my very best thanks."—S. Rogers (1763-1855). Under Hampstead, a quotation from Mrs. Barbauld (1743-1825): "Hampstead is certainly the prettiest village about London." And under the announcement of the Cinderella Dance, again from Mrs. Barbauld: "Reluctant shall I bid thee then, farewell." Of the Bazaar publications we understand that Dr. Brooke Herford's address on "The Lesser and the Larger Unitarianism" had a certain sale, and that anyone who opened it and saw the portrait, bought it. On the Essex Church stall another booklet was offered for sale, "London Unitarians Fifty Years Ago," by Dr. Sadler. This opens with a delightful portrait of the author, and is an extremely interesting collection of reminiscences, read in 1884 to the Rosslyn Hill Congregational Society, and afterwards printed in The Christian Reformer. This re-issue is further illustrated by full-page portraits of the Revs. T. Madge, Joseph Hutton, E. Tagart, R. Aspland, and W. J. Fox. Copies of the booklet may now be had at Essex Church, or from the Rev. F. K. Freeston, price 1s.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—On Monday last the Glamorganshire churches held their annual musical festival at Aberdare, when the English Calvinistic Methodists, not for the first time, kindly placed their handsome chapel at the service of their neighbours, whose own were not so central nor so large. The following churches sent contingents, in addition to the three local ones:—Cefncoed, Merthyr, Wick, Pentre, Clydach Vale, Tylorstown, Gellionen, and Trebannos. The leader was the Rev. David Evans, of Wick; the organist, Mr. Morgan, Trebannos, Swansea Valley; the chairman of the afternoon session was Colonel Thomas Phillips, of Aberdare, Clerk of the U.D. Council; and of the evening meeting Mr. J. James, barrister-at-law (son of the late C. H. James, M.P. for the Merthyr Boroughs, and in 1880-81 President of B. and F.U.A.), who had come down from London specially for the purpose. The attendance at both meetings filled the chapel to its utmost capacity, and the collections were "a record."

Bath (Resignation).—At the annual general meeting of the congregation of Trim-street Chapel, held on May 3, a letter from the Rev. F. W. Stanley was read, tendering his resignation of the office of minister, which he has held for nearly twenty years. He much regretted leaving the congregation, with whom he has always been on the happiest terms, but felt it to be his duty to accept the invitation of the congregation of Effra-road Church, Brixton, where a very important field of work lay before him. The meeting received this intimation with great regret, and expressed hearty appreciation of Mr. Stanley's services and sorrow at parting with him and Mrs. Stanley, who has so earnestly and untiringly co-operated with him in all work connected with the chapel. They desired, however, to congratulate Mr. Stanley on being called to a wider sphere of usefulness.

Bedfield.—The annual flower services were held last Sunday. The flowers were on the following day sent to the St. Marylebone (London) Infirmary.

Buxton.—On Sunday week the Rev. George Street preached a vigorous sermon in Hartington-road Church against the use of bad language, dwelling especially on the shocking nature of such language on the lips of little children, and urging the need of discipline and a healthier home influence.

Framlingham.—The Rev. H. J. Lawson preached here on Sunday evening last.

Heywood.—On Sunday, May 6, Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. John Page Hoppe. There were very large congregations, and the choir, under the leadership of Mr. James Chadwick, was considerably augmented by a contingent of the scholars of the Sunday-school. Although the day was not very favourable, the offertories were the largest received at the school sermons, and amounted to £62.

London: Brixton (Appointment).—The Rev. F. W. Stanley, of Bath, has accepted an invitation to the ministry of Effra-road Chapel, in succession to the Rev. James Harwood, B.A.

London: Peckham.—At a congregational meeting of the Avondale-road Church on Tuesday last, the Rev. G. Carter opened a conference on the subject of open-air preaching. Although open-air preaching and tract distribution were not, he believed, looked upon with much favour by the generality of Unitarians, they were esteemed as agencies by their Orthodox fellow-Christians. He recalled a time when large meetings assembled on Peckham-rye at Sunday evening services, conducted by himself, these being supplemented by week-night addresses, in which some half-dozen Unitarian ministers, and as many leading laymen, took part. With our rational views of religion, he felt sure that no speakers would secure more respectful attention than Unitarians, among whom were many with mental culture, power of voice, and fluency of speech, well fitting them for the work; while others might give help in at least forming the nucleus of a congregation, taking part in singing, tract distribution, &c. He had often thought it might be well if one of our "Forward" movements could be made in the direction of a well-organised and boldly advertised Open-air Mission, in which an interchange of service might be effected in different districts. Other speakers commended the minister's suggestions, and a general willingness was manifested to assist in experimental work in Peckham.

Manchester.—At a recent meeting of the Committee of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, it was announced that a legacy of £50 had been received from the executors of the late Mr. Charles Wragg, of Chesterfield, and a legacy of £75 from the executors of the late Mr. John Harrop, of Macclesfield.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The annual report has just been issued in the form of a little booklet of thirty-six pages. It refers to the losses suffered by town congregations owing to removals, but shows that these have been more than neutralised by the enrolment of eighteen new members during the past year. During the past three years forty-eight new members have been added, while thirty-three old members have been lost. This illustrates the difficulty with which city congregations have to contend. All the institutions are reported to be in a very satisfactory condition, and the small adverse balance in the treasurer's report was at once cleared off by a collection at the annual meeting. The latter was well attended and most enthusiastic; Mr. Councillor Pritchard, J.P., presided, and spoke encouragingly of the prospects of the church. Mr. Councillor Marsden was elected churchwarden, and the committee and other officials were all re-elected. On the Sunday following the annual meeting the Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted by Mrs. S. Farrington. There was a great gathering of old scholars and other friends to welcome Mrs. Farrington, and all were deeply impressed by her earnest and affectionate counsels. In the afternoon "Recitation Sunday" was held, when the songs and readings were selected from the works of Miss Procter.

Mossley.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached morning and evening by the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, of Southport, and in the afternoon by the Rev. C. E. Oliver, B.A., of Denton. The collections amount to £48.

Reading.—The Reading congregation have presented the Rev. E. A. Voysey with a complete set of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," on the occasion of his removal from Reading, as a token of kind feeling and good wishes.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The anniversary services in connection with the Sunday-school were held in the chapel on Sunday last, when the sermons were preached, both morning and evening, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., of London, and special hymns and anthems were rendered by the school children. Despite the unfavourable weather, the attendance at both services was very satisfactory. Collections for the school funds realised £21 1s. 8d.

Stalybridge.—The Rev. W. Harrison has been unanimously elected by the School Board to take the place of a member, resigned. Mr. Harrison has previously been on the School Board for six years, but just escaped being successful at the last election through the multiplicity of candidates.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The 212th anniversary of this church was celebrated on Sunday last, by special services conducted by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford. On the following evening a conversazione was held in the Wellington-street schoolroom, under the presidency of Mr. Alderman Nelson, J.P. The guests were received by the Rev. W. H. and Mrs. Lambelle, and the proceedings were interspersed with vocal and instrumental music.

Tavistock.—On Wednesday evening, May 2, the Countess Wachtmeister, widow of the late Swedish Ambassador, addressed the Abbey Chapel Guild on the subject of "The Power of Prayer and Devotion." The address was very beautiful and eloquent, and was much appreciated by all who heard it. The May service, for which the chapel was decorated with flowers, then followed. According to ancient custom, the text from which the Rev. John Barron preached was "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

Wales.—Yr Ymofynydd, our Welsh magazine for the current month, gives an account of successful tea meetings at Cefncoed, Rhydygwin, and Capelygroes. We are promised a full account, in the June number, of the London Bazaar, which has roused such great interest in our churches during the past few months. Among the obits we find the names of two noble Unitarians who did good work in their day on behalf of liberal thought—Mr. William Hughes, Cefncoed, at the age of eighty-two, and Lewis Williams, Gellionen, aged seventy-nine.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

"I might fill volumes with quotations of experiments of every conceivable, and to most of us, inconceivable kind—experiments on the eye, the sensory tracts, the action of the brain after parts of it have been sliced away, on the nature of pain and its action on different parts of the system; experiments with burning and freezing, subjecting the creature to atmospheric pressure until it becomes as stiff as a board; tormenting a dog in order to test its feelings by successive cruelties, which make one almost despair of human nature, or of human society, which permits a practice wherein such things are possible, to remain under the protection of the law.—See "The Ethics of Vivisection," by Mrs. Mona Caird. THE seventy-fifth anniversary meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to be held in Whit-week, will be on a much more modest scale than the American celebrations in Boston next week, which will have something of an International character, and in which by the presence of our representatives and in the most cordial sympathy we shall have our share; but there will be no lack of interest in our meetings, and the experience of previous National Conference years encourages the hope that they will be, if anything, more successful than usual, both in point of numbers and enthusiasm. The secretary is to be home again, fresh from the Boston celebrations, and at the annual meeting of the Sunday School Association, which falls on the Tuesday of Whit-week, the first fruits of the American visit are to be gathered in by Miss Marian Pritchard, in her address: "A Glimpse at Sunday School Work in America." The Association's annual sermon is to be preached by the Rev. C. J. Street, and the business meeting will be enriched by the President's address on "An Ideal Church," and a further address, by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, on "Dr. Martineau and Unitarian Christianity." The Thursday's Conference should be of great practical service, on the basis of two papers, on "Opportunities and Methods of Unitarian Work Suggested by Experiences in America," by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, and "Possible Developments of Unitarian Missionary Work in England," by Mr. Richard Robinson, of Liverpool.

THE annual meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, which is to be held on Thursday next, at Essex Hall, with Sir John T. Brunner in the chair, will not only be interesting as the Jubilee meeting of the Society, but peculiarly so from the statement then to be made as to the financial results of the recent "Grand Bazaar." We are not informed as to the exact figures, but we have every reason to believe that the announcement to be made will be of the most gratifying character.

THE Bishop of London devoted a great part of his Presidential address in opening the London Diocesan Conference on Tuesday to a consideration of a proposed special Conference for the consideration of the present divisions and differences of opinion in the Church. "However much the outward things may remain the same," he said, "the inward movement of the mind of man is always going on on its own lines, and is not to be contained within either formulae on the one side or forms on the other." And he added:—

When we look back upon the history of our Church we see that that Church somehow or other seems to have constantly courted disruption. It is the great fault that can be brought against the Church of England that it has shown a very decided reluctance to make room for new exhibitions of the working of spiritual powers. It is to that, unfortunately, that we owe so much Nonconformity as exists at present. The Church of England has in the past been too satisfied with its system, and too reluctant to see that system either changed or explained so as to meet the altering circumstances of the time.

In conclusion, the Bishop asked the Conference to consider whether, if such a special Conference were held, it should be confined to Churchmen, or whether representatives of Nonconformist bodies should also be included in it.

AFTER the very disappointing attitude adopted by Lord Salisbury toward the Bishop of Winchester's resolution in the House of Lords, in reference to action to be taken on the lines of what is common to the Minority and Majority reports of Lord Peel's Commission, when the unusual spectacle was witnessed of all the Bishops present in the House of Lords, headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, voting against the Government, it was pleasant to read the report of the annual meeting of the Army Temperance Association on May 14, over which Sir George White presided. At this meeting a letter from Lord Roberts was read, cordially approving of the work of the Association, and adding:—

I believe that nothing but good can result from so many soldiers, from all parts of the Empire, being brought together in an arduous campaign, when they see how splendidly our temperance men have borne up against the many difficulties and dangers which they have had to face.

Sir George White referred with much satisfaction of the changed attitude of commanding officers towards temperance work in the Army, and spoke especially of the good work done by the Association in India, where he was happy to say that about a third of the men were total abstainers.

As to what still remains for Nonconformists to achieve in the matter of religious equality, Mr. Carvell Williams, in his Presidential Address to the Congregational Union, spoke as follows:—

We may legitimately complain that a section of the community who constitute half the worshipping population of the country are denounced by State-appointed clergymen as heretics and schismatics. We may complain still more that the national cathedrals and churches are closed against our most gifted and eminent ministers; while they are available for various purposes connected with the national Church. Nor are the ministers of Nonconformity allowed to have any share in religious ceremonies of a national character. Even so poor an office as that of prison chaplain is one of the clerical monopolies of the Establishment; which alone—under quite recent regulations—is permitted to conduct mission services within prison walls! While the national Universities are open to all, Nonconformists are excluded—not by law, but in fact—from the head-masterships of all our great endowed schools, and from many of those of less pretensions. And lastly—and this is a disability which has not come down from the past, but has been created towards the end of this century—Nonconformist children are forced by law to attend Church schools, which are at the same time closed against Nonconformist pupil-teachers; while training colleges are mainly in sectarian hands and are utilised for sectarian purposes.

MORE BAZAAR ECHOES.

At a meeting of the Executive of the London Unitarian Bazaar, held on May 16 at Essex Hall, the following resolutions were passed:—

That the warm and hearty thanks of this Committee be given to those kind friends in and around Manchester who have sent us such substantial help. For the liberal contributions in money and in beautiful and useful goods for their stall; but most of all for the hearty and friendly spirit in which they associated themselves with us in our great effort to meet the needs of the London District Unitarian Society. This Committee feels that their visible presence amongst us at the Bazaar gave it a wider interest to all who visited the King's Hall, and renewed the feeling we should be so glad to cherish, that whatever distance apart, Unitarians all over the country can work together for the common cause.

That the very cordial thanks of this Committee be given to the Welsh friends whose contributions in money and in goods were so valuable and helpful, the subscribers to the fund numbering 597, and the articles contributed to the Bazaar being sent from twenty-three chapels in the Principality. The Committee particularly appreciate this manifestation of interest in our great effort in this city, and feel grateful for this deepening of the spirit of fellowship existing amongst Unitarians of England and of Wales.

Similar vote of thanks were accorded to the friends of the Provincial Assembly, Postal Mission, and Denton "Hat" Stalls.

Mrs. W. H. Talbot, President of the Manchester District Stall, together with the treasurer and secretary, on behalf of their Committee, desire to thank all friends who so generously helped in their effort, and to add the following statement:—"The amount already paid to the Bazaar fund is £416 8s., and there are sales of pictures to add to this. In addition to the above a considerable number of valuable articles have been left with the London Committee to be disposed of by them at local sales, and the clothing left over from the Bazaar has been given to the London missions." The congregations contributing in money or goods, or both, were as follows:—Altrincham and Hale, Blackley, Bradford, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Cross-street, Dob-lane, Longsight, Monton, Moss-side, Oldham, Oldham-road, Platt, Swinton, Strangeways, Upper Brook-street, Bury, Ainsworth, Atherton, and Heywood.

Among the pictures, of different kinds, of the late Dr. Martineau, which were very naturally found among the art treasures of the Bazaar, there was one on glass, suitably decorated and leaded for insertion in a church window. The artist, Mr. E. F. Langstaffe, of Wandsworth, has succeeded in preserving a very good likeness, while the special medium and colouring lend a peculiar serenity to the face, such as befits a presentation of an ideal "Saint." If, instead of copying imaginary portraits, such a face as this could be placed in all churches possessing storied windows, a real means of grace would be secured to the beholders. We understand that a good deal of work by the same artist is included in the windows executed by Messrs. Heaton, Butler and Bayne for Manchester College, the Monton Church, and elsewhere in our connection. This portrait of Dr. Martineau was at once purchased by Sir John Brunner, for presentation to the new church at Gateshead, and for five pounds any other church may possess a replica. Communications may be made to Mr. Langstaffe, at the address of the firm, 14, Garrick-street, W.C.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In this month's Contemporary Review, the Rev. W. W. Peyton concludes an article, begun in the April number, on "The Crucifixion, as an Evolutionary Force." In primitive religion, he says, communion was with the Infinite Father and the Eternal Spirit, "not always distinguishable to the ancient mind." The Christian religion began, when to this was added communion with Christ, "discovered in the Godhead of the Father and the Spirit." The Crucifixion, the Resurrection, and the Incarnation, in Mr. Peyton's view, represent three constructive forces, which have gone to the making of the Christian world. Others may be ready to acknowledge and trace their working, although they find no reality behind the words of the saying that "The crucified Lord passed into the Godhead." Of the force exercised by the Crucifixion, Mr. Peyton speaks as follows:—

The death of Christ, in the evolutionary progression, drew forth into clear light the Love which lay in the plan of the creation. The real discovery was then made that sympathy, sacrifice, service are affections in the unseen universe, that Nature is underlaid with them, and that we are the cherished objects of affection. This vision of Divine love, shown in vicarious suffering and death, flashed upon an astonished world, broke the routine of nations, and recovered a sick age, and ever since has remained a force of the first magnitude in our affairs. It was the finding of a richer environment, and the human response to it showed that the evolution of the man had taken place to consort with the opulent environment.

Before the crucifixion, Mr. Peyton says, "men were not sensitive to the love with which God yearned towards them, and they did not give the answer of love." But the "suffering love of the Crucifixion" brought the supreme truth home to them. The most suggestive passage in the article is, perhaps, that which speaks of the manner in which life is glorified by death.

In the same number the Rev. E. F. M. MacCarthy, of the Birmingham School Board, writes on "The New Code," pointing out that while teachers rejoice over the abolition of the "payment by results" system, there is danger that the conditions under which the Block-Grant is to be made will (i.) weaken, instead of strengthen, the control of the Education Department over school managers; and (ii.) lessen, instead of increase, the influence of Parliamentary and general public opinion upon the condition of the schools.

Dr. Guinness Rogers, in an article on "The Churches and the War," urges that they should have done more to oppose the war spirit, and while admitting grave and serious errors on both sides, and the shame of a war which ought to have been avoided, is inclined to think that impartial history will pass severer judgment on "the representatives of a mighty Power which can certainly better afford to exercise forbearance and generosity" than on the heads of the two small Republics. Further controversy on the same subject is furnished by a duel between Mr. J. A. Hobson and Mr. W. Hosken on "The Testimony from Johannesburg." "Imperial Federation" is the subject of articles in both the Contemporary and the Nineteenth Century. In the latter review one of the most interesting articles is on "Women's Clubs in America," telling of a most interesting variety of such societies and of a general Federation of Women's Clubs of the United States, with a membership of 150,000. A large proportion of these clubs, it is said, have developed a special interest in municipal matters and in the reform of municipal legislation bearing upon women and children; their members acquaint themselves with existing economic conditions, and have already secured many reforms, remedying abuses and relieving the hardships of industrial life. Mrs. Hugh Bell writes "On the Merits and Demerits of Thrift," Mrs. J. R. Green on "Growing Bureaucracy and Parliamentary Decline," and Mr. Alexander Sutherland proves to his own surprise from a wide induction that women really have less brains than men.

Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton, writes to demur to the accuracy of our description last week of his article in the current number of the New World as "An unsympathetic study of St. Paul," and adds that any reader of the concluding paragraph of his article, will admit that he has shown "no lack of admiration or sympathy for the great personality of the Apostle."

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

COMPARATIVE RELIGION.

I.

The Place of the Study in Modern Thought.

AMONG the new studies of the nineteenth century none has grown more rapidly, or produced already more significant results, than that which Professor Max Müller, thirty years ago (1870), formally described as "The Science of Religion." More than a hundred years before Hume had laid the basis for it in his dissertation on "The Natural History of Religion" in 1757. With the materials then available, by comparison and analysis, Hume had endeavoured to work out the problem of the origin of religion in human experience. He traced it back to the intellectual impulse which sought for the causes of the phenomena by which man is encompassed and affected, and the emotions of hope and fear arising out of his dependence on them. The work of Hume was far beyond his time. The average mind of the eighteenth century did not interest itself about such questions. "There are two objects of curiosity"—such was the dictum of Dr. Johnson—"the Christian world and the Mohammedan world; all the rest may be considered as barbarous." Even as he spoke influences were already at work which were destined to break down this grotesque and ignorant limitation. English scholarship followed English arms in India, and began to bring to light literatures and philosophies of which the Western world had never dreamed. One by one the great civilisations of the past yielded up their treasures, and this century has witnessed the discovery of ancient faiths, so that the history of religion is now known to be inseparably connected with the whole history of the human race. To sketch this process (as clearly as may be within such narrow compass) is the object of the following papers.

The religious controversies of the first part of the eighteenth century were largely concerned with the distinction between Natural and Revealed Religion. In the conception of revealed religion the main stress fell on the doctrines which were supposed to lie beyond the scope of human reason, so that they could only be made known to man by a supernatural process. Religion, accordingly, was supposed to lie in the acceptance of a system of truths, presented from some external source, and duly sanctioned by appropriate manifestations of authority. Now, as different religions taught different doctrines about Divine things, they could not all be true. From the Evangelical point of view, therefore, religions might be classified as true and false, a division which has lasted on to our own day, as when the late Sir W. Monier Williams described Brahmanism, Buddhism, and Mohammedanism, as the "three chief false religions."

Modern philosophy, however, is founded on a different assumption. Following on Hume, Kant undertook his great inquiry into the theory of human knowledge, and German thought grappled with the problem of the relation between the mind within and the world without. This led inevitably to fresh attempts to explain the significance of religion. But they were not based on the historical record of revelation; they were founded on the analysis of inner experience. This investigation brought to light new elements, to which varying importance might, indeed, be assigned, but all of which were discovered within the soul itself. One school might lay stress on the principle of thought, on the essentially rational character of the world. In this case the secret meaning of religion was apprehended in the relation of the thought of man to that of God. Another might raise feeling into prominence, insist on the consciousness of dependence as the root of faith, and find in sentiments of humility and reverence, of awe and trust, the ground of the religious life. The great doctrines of religion were then interpreted as the efforts of the intellect to state and organise its experience; but these only constituted the form, and consequently changed as knowledge widened and the horizon of thought enlarged; what was important was that the emotions should be genuine and unforced. It is not needful to rehearse the specific modifications successively suggested by the great teachers of Germany: Kant, with his reconstruction of religion on an ethical basis, Hegel and his doctrine of the absolute, Schleiermacher with his protest that religion is neither morals nor metaphysics but lies in the feeling with which the soul contemplates the varied life revealed in nature and in man—these three names may stand as representatives of different aspects of the great inquiry and the solutions which it begot. However much they might differ in detail, or even in principle, they all agreed in this—the sources of religion were to be found in the mind itself. In other words, religion belonged to man as man; its outward acts of worship, like its traditional beliefs, arose out of inner impulses quite independent of external divine commands. Religion, therefore, must be regarded as inseparably bound up with human nature; it had a universal character, and the study of it was justified by psychology. It was one of the great merits of Theodore Parker, in his "Discourse of Religion," 1842, to emphasize this general result. It was of course implicitly contained in different forms in the teaching of Carlyle and Emerson. In the light of these ideas the doctrine of primeval revelation, still applied in this country by Mr. Gladstone and the editor of the "Speaker's Commentary," the late Canon Cook, receded into the background. It was no longer necessary to explain the facts.*

Meantime the scholars of Germany and France were actively at work beside the philosophers. Meiners opened the way with a "General Critical History of Religions," published at Hanover in 1806. Creuzer and Constant followed, and Ferdinand Christian Baur showed the range of his knowledge in an early treatise on "Symbolism and Mythology" (1824). The first serious attempt to formulate laws of religious development was made by Comte in the "Philosophie Positive," but the time for such an effort was not yet come. Far more careful study of the historical manifestations of religion was necessary, before any general theory could be successfully established. But meantime an extraordinary impulse in the study of the early forms of religion was received from a hitherto unknown field.

In 1838 appeared the Sanskrit text of the first book of the hymns of the Rig Veda. The brilliant young scholar, Frederick Rosen, who had begun the enterprise, had died the previous year, and for a time it seemed as if no one could carry on the work. But another young German scholar was at hand. Fresh from the lectures of Eugène Burnouf in Paris, recommended by Baron Bunsen, supported by the East India Company, Max Müller undertook the laborious task of editing, for the first time, the ancient hymns of the Aryan ancestors of the Hindus, and the commentary embodying their traditional explanation. The first volume was published in 1849, and five others followed in the next twenty years. The significance of Sanskrit for comparative philology had been known for some time. But here were revealed a whole series of astonishing parallels with the gods of Greece. Zeus could be at once identified with the Indian Dyaus, and the prayers to the "Sky-father" showed that a thousand years and more before our era the men of the Punjaub and the middle Ganges valley had in some sense addressed themselves to the Father which is in heaven. A number of other deities in turn came into view, and round these gathered epithets and stories resembling those of the Hellenic peoples. Out of a comparison of these sprang the new science of comparative mythology.* The essence of this science lay in the assumption that the myth was originally an effort to interpret the phenomena of nature, in terms of personality and human relation. The phenomena in question might be connected with the heavenly bodies, with the sun and moon pre-eminently, with the vicissitudes of the storm; but the story had a basis in some observed fact, and its meaning (which had become obscured by decay) was to be discovered through the study of language. When this view was applied to the investigation of early religion, the element which came most into prominence was the element of belief. The myths of different peoples contained their oldest thoughts about the gods; the titles by which these beings were designated, involved so many ideas; and these conceptions seemed the important thing in determining the character and value of any ancient faith. The field of mythology was so vast that it appeared to include everything. With amazing skill and fearless courage a whole army of scholars devoted themselves to the comparison and explanation of myths, as if they enshrined the secrets of primitive religion. It was a necessary work; but it did not, after all, exhaust the range of the new study, and a number of influences have since diverted attention into other directions.

Paramount among these influences was the general doctrine of evolution. This could, of course, be applied at any point in the long line of historical development. It could be invoked in explanation of the modifications of the higher faiths traceable in literature. But it had a special significance in connection with the forms of the lower culture. For it was the assumption of evolution that the higher races had

* A different feeling is found in Maurice's "Religions of the World," 1848, which is defective, however, on the historical side. Much more careful appreciations, based on extended investigation of the materials then available, are to be seen in Hardwick's "Christ and other Masters," 1856-1858; second and posthumous edition in two vols., 1863.

* Max Müller's famous essay on "Comparative Mythology" was first published in 1856.

themselves passed through the ruder phases of an earlier growth. They had emerged out of conditions resembling those which could still be studied in the savage communities of our own time. If so, then the loftier religions occupying the peaks of history had been slowly reared out of the levels of thought and feeling traceable at this day. The principle of continuity could not be accepted in one department and rejected in another, and accordingly all the historic aspects of religion must be capable of some sort of co-ordination. This had been already affirmed by Auguste Comte, but it was destined now to be established on a much wider basis of inductive research than was open to him. In the light of the new ideas it was soon seen that the religions embodied in the Vedic hymns could not be in any sense regarded as "primitive." They had a long history behind them. They belonged to various stages of culture, and represented cruder and more advanced phases of thought blended together in strange juxtaposition. The search for "origins," therefore, pushed its endeavours still further back; and the beginnings of religion were explored with the aid of the rising science of anthropology.

Foremost among the interpreters of this science stands the honoured name of Dr. E. B. Tylor, whose investigations into the "Early History of Civilisation" (1865), were quickly followed by his famous work on "Primitive Culture" in 1871. For many minds the careful study of this book has made an era never to be forgotten. It supplies them with a method of investigation; it marshals with splendid order vast armies of carefully collated facts; it proceeds so calmly but so surely along the path of science from the known to the unknown. Other scholars were of course working in the same field. In England alone Mr. Herbert Spencer had long before, in one of his luminous essays, suggested an important line of inquiry into the primitive theory of the soul, afterwards elaborately expanded in his "Principles of Sociology," and Sir John Lubbock discoursed genially of the "Origins of Civilisation." The effect of these studies was visible in many ways. An enormous mass of material was collected, proving the immense significance of religion as a social force in early forms of tribal life. But this power was exerted largely through certain common acts. Mythology, therefore, viewed as an interpretation of celestial or atmospheric phenomena, occupied a less prominent place, and rites (such as those of sacrifice) came to the front. These, no doubt, implied more or less definite beliefs; but this element exerted much less practical effect than other powers in the traditional agencies through which the tribal ideas of life were brought to bear upon the individual. The study of sacred acts, of mysteries of initiation, and the like, with all the emotions which they involve, has for a time concentrated the attention of investigators on the social aspects of early religion; many myths are now seen to have a ritual rather than a physical meaning, and the philological "key to all mythologies" is perhaps unduly discredited because it had been unduly exalted. The works of Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Frazer, and the late Professor W. Robertson Smith, have laid the foundations of new developments of research. The survival of savage beliefs and usages in religion among peoples otherwise advanced can no longer be ignored. The rise of the historical method has vindicated the pregnant saying of Confucius, "To understand the present we must study the past."

In the treasury of helpful sayings bequeathed to us by Mr. Ruskin, we find this counsel:—"Make for yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts. None of us know what fairy palaces we may build of beautiful thought, proof against all adversity." Then, rising to a higher level, he leads us to think of the spiritual meditations we may make our own, out of which we may form "houses built without hands for our souls to live in."

It is a wise injunction, doubtless, which would persuade us to provide a shelter in which, at any moment, we may seek refuge when the temptations, worries, and cares of life press upon us; and no less certainly, one way to fulfil it is to store the memory with inspiring words which may touch the springs of conscience in time of need, or turn us to the peace and rest of spirit for which we long. In familiar words from "Hours of Thought," we are told that it is by the "Way of Remembrance" that "every conquering call to higher life comes to us," and few of us are without the experience of what we owe to the "flash of a phrase or the tone of an unforgotten psalm."

Bearing these considerations in mind, we shall welcome the appearance of a memorial volume of a century's religious life, in which are gathered together, as spiritual food for each day in the year, passages from the writings of teachers who have ministered to the needs of our churches. A little consideration of the Index of this new "Book of Daily Strength" is enough to show us what treasures we shall find in its pages. The writings of both English and American authors have been searched to furnish the thoughts which are to provide guidance and help for the day's pilgrimage; and beneath the text, at the head of each page, we find illustrative hymns and prose extracts, some already dear and familiar to us, others which will prove on acquaintance no less full of spiritual refreshment—all of which will help to raise the "houses built without hands for our souls to live in."

One very noticeable feature of this book is the varied nature of its contents. Passages have been chosen to suit all frames of mind and to minister to different requirements, and, as the Editor tells us in his introductory words, "any one using the book as a daily companion will soon become familiar with its order, and if any day should not furnish the needed word it will be easy to turn to another."

This "Book of Daily Strength" has had many fore-runners. Probably the remembrance of all we have gained from them will lead us to welcome the more gladly the new comer. The advent of a fresh friend does not lead us to forget the old companions. But, as already intimated, there is one characteristic in this collection of selected sayings which former compilations do not possess. It is the result of a purpose thus described in the Preface:—

The second purpose which has given a distinctive character to the book may be seen by a glance at the Index of Authors. The writers from whom selections have been made belong to one religious community, or, more strictly speaking, two kindred communities in England and America, on which the popular Churches of Christendom look askance. With rare, if any, exceptions, they may be described in the matter of their theological belief as Unitarian, but the ideal of religious fellowship which their leaders maintain is Catholic in the true spiritual sense. They would be the very last to limit their devotional reading to any one field, confining it to writers of their own way of thinking, and if this little book had aimed at being the only one of its kind, it would have been compiled on a very different principle. But at the end of a century of religious life it seemed not inappropriate to gather up some such humble memorial as this, recalling the words of revered and beloved teachers, which would speak with peculiar force within the household itself, and might, at the same time, bear a useful testimony in other quarters to the significance of their religious life.

And so, from the pages of this book, among the first in chronological order speaks to us the brave Theophilus Lindsey, who, while Unitarianism was still punishable by law, ministered to the little company of heretics in the dull upper room in Essex-street, London. And Dr. Channing and Theodore Parker speak to us, who, in their different ways, sowed the seed of the Unitarian faith, which was to replace the outgrown creed of Puritan times and lead the way to a spiritual revolution in the United States. The pages are rich with the words of representatives of our section of the Christian Church—of faithful teachers who are still living in our midst, and of others, held sacred in our memories, who have passed away from earth, among whose revered names are numbered those of John James Tayler, John Hamilton Thom, and of that great inspirer and seer whose departure we have lately been called upon to mourn.

All readers of The Inquirer are familiar, from personal experience or hearsay, with the fact that much ignorance and misunderstanding exist outside our borders concerning the faith we hold so dear. We may differ among ourselves as to the name by which our group of churches may be most fitly designated, and there may be various shades of belief concerning minor points in our theological views; but we all desire that the great religious truths concerning which we are at one should have fair representation in the world outside our borders, and that troubled souls who are storm-tossed amid the doubts and questionings of our times might find their way, if to do so would help them, into the haven of free religious thought wherein we have found shelter.

Towards this end, and as a companion in hours of meditation and devotion, this "Book of Daily Strength" cannot fail to minister, and it will, doubtless, have a hearty welcome and a wide circulation.

A word must be said as to the external form of the book. Type and binding are both good. The volume may be had in two forms, either in cloth or on finer paper in leather binding, which gives a book lighter to handle and very attractive in appearance.

WESTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE fifty-fourth annual meeting of the Western Union was held at Taunton, on Thursday, May 10, and was well attended.

The business meeting was held in the morning, the President, Major-General JACOB, of Tavistock, in the chair.

The PRESIDENT, in the course of his address, said that their Western Union covered a very wide area, and the churches were few and far between. But each of those churches was a centre of free religious thought, and the fact of their existence was a guarantee of a steady leavening influence, which was showing itself to-day and which would produce results in the future, which would not have been brought about had not their scattered churches held firm to their great principles of liberty and growth in religious thought. Their work was much more wide-reaching than their congregations. They liberalised the religious thought of the other churches by their unconscious influence. Their Assembly that day was, therefore, a more important institution than many of them might think, insomuch as it brought them together and sent them back with new vigour to their different towns. Since last they met they had had a very eventful time in the history of the nation, in their denomination, and also within their own district. For the first time for many years they were at war with civilised men. That assembly was not the place for vindicating the justice of their part in the war or of entering into criticism of the circumstances preceding the war, but they must all be agreed upon this—that the patriotism of the nation had been rekindled, the Empire was united as it had never been before, and the loyalty of the Empire to their beloved Queen, which had been displayed in such a variety of ways, was deep and genuine. They rejoiced at the splendid health Her Majesty enjoyed, and that her declining years should be blessed by the united love of her subjects. While war engaged their attention in South Africa they remembered the famine which was working havoc amongst their fellow-subjects in India. Adversity had called forth some of the finest qualities of their people, in the self-sacrificing and unstinting generosity of which they had had so much evidence. Surely it had been demonstrated that genuine religion was above all systems and theologies. The passing away of Dr. Martineau would render that year conspicuous in their history. The widespread appreciation of him from almost every denomination indicated the growth of tolerance towards ideas which years ago would scarcely have received notice from many of the orthodox churches. Referring to the work of the Union, he remarked that the Sunday-schools were worthy of the labour devoted to them. It was a matter of regret amongst them that many of their ministers had to depend upon grants from various sources to make up their incomes, which, even with additional aid were quite small enough. Dr. Martineau's scheme had, as far as conditions permitted, been put into effect. But those conditions had been, and were, such as made the full realisation of the ideal Dr. Martineau set forth a matter of time. They certainly ought not to lose sight of it. It was highly necessary for the future welfare of their movement that the position of their ministry should be made more secure, and that the ministry should be properly and systematically supported. It was no credit to any denomination to have its ministers poorly paid, and the prospect of a life of straitened financial circumstances was no encouragement to young men of ability and earnestness to enter the ministry. The present condition of affairs was due to stern necessity. It might be that the best was done that could be done at present. But as their churches increased and their membership grew and financial circumstances improved, the support of the ministry should have prior consideration. In conclusion, he welcomed Dr. Klein, whom they were all looking forward with pleasure to hearing that afternoon and evening. Last, but not least, the generous hospitality of their Taunton friends in inviting them to their beautiful historic town would be a pleasant subject to move resolutions upon at the proper stage in their programme. The good of the cause there and the encouragement of the Rev. Jeffery Worthington and those who worked with him were largely in their thoughts at that time.

On the motion of the Rev. H. S. SOLLY, seconded by Mr. M. BAKER, the committee's report was adopted.

The report dwelt upon the fraternal duty the Committee had been called upon to discharge in the aid of the scattered congregations of the district, and spoke with satisfaction of the growing liberalism in other religious communions, while yet there was as much need as ever for the faithful maintenances of the principles for which their churches stood. Amid many discouragements, and personal changes among the company of workers, there had been no relaxation of effort. The vacant pulpits had been satisfactorily filled, except in the case of Devonport and Crewkerne. A welcome was accorded to the Rev. A. E. O'Connor on his settlement at Torquay, and to the Rev. A. Lancaster, who had succeeded the Rev. J. Wain at the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, Bristol, the latter having removed to Trowbridge. The Gloucester congregation had paid off £250 of their debt, and a new schoolroom had been built at Crewkerne. Friends at Newton Abbot had organised themselves as a church. Among the losses sustained by death during the year grateful mention was made of Mrs. Colfox, of Bridport, and Mr. W. T. Holland, of Bridgwater. Particulars were added as to the aided congregations at Bridgwater, Crewkerne, Cullompton and Yeovil. The report of the Postal Mission was as follows:—"During the year 1899 the secretary has received applications for literature from 145 correspondents. Out of this number 69 have written more than once, and 42 of these have borrowed books. The number of former correspondents is, at a low estimate, 50. The number of books lent to old and new correspondents during the year is 230. The secretary has been much encouraged in her Postal Mission work by the warm thanks of the great majority of her correspondents, who through its agency discover that instead of being isolated individuals, with unknown and unheard-of ideas, a literature exists which gives convincing expression to their own beliefs, and they are members of a Church with a name and a history." Encouraging statistics of some of the Sunday-schools were also given. At Bridgwater there were among the scholars 42 girls over sixteen years of age.

On the motion of the Rev. J. S. MATHERS, seconded by the Rev. E. PARRY, the officers and committee were elected, the Rev. H. S. Solly being appointed president, Mr. P. J. Worsley, treasurer, and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, secretary.

The PRESIDENT moved a resolution of thanks to the Rev. F. W. Stanley for his long, efficient, and faithful services as hon. secretary of the Union, and, while sincerely regretting his departure from the Western District, the meeting expressed its affectionate wishes for his welfare and usefulness in the fresh sphere of work to which he had been called at Brixton.

Mr. WORSLEY seconded the proposal.

The Rev. J. WORTHINGTON said that personally he deeply regretted the departure of Mr. Stanley from the West of England. Perhaps Mr. Stanley had been known to himself longer than to anyone else in that chapel, and he rejoiced that he was going to the church in London of which he (Mr. Worthington) was minister for nine years before coming to Taunton.

The proposal was agreed to with acclamation.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY, in response, said it was not a pleasant thing to him, after twenty years' connection with the Union, to attend the last of its meetings in an official capacity. He had been on the committee for twenty years, and he had been either joint or sole secretary for thirteen years.

Mr. WORSLEY proposed payment of the usual grants to chapels connected with the Union, and said they must rejoice to find themselves in that ancient chapel in the beautiful town of Taunton, which was one of the old strongholds of Nonconformity in the West of England.

The Rev. J. WORTHINGTON seconded the motion, which was agreed to.

Thanks were then offered to the Revs. Dr. Klein and J. Wain for the services they were to render during the day. The congregation at Newton Abbot was admitted to the roll of the Assembly, and a welcome was accorded to the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, representing the B. and F.U.A., and to the Revs. Marion Murdock and Florence Buck, of America. Votes of thanks were also passed to the lay-preachers and postal mission workers, to the Rev. J. Worthington, and the Taunton congregation, and to the President.

THE SERVICE.

After luncheon in the Memorial Schools, under the presidency of Mr. C. J. GOODLAND, J.P., a religious service was held, conducted by the Rev. J. Wain, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. KLEIN, of Liverpool, the texts being Hebrews xi. 10, and Romans i. 17, and the subject "Faith." In the course of his sermon Dr. Klein said that they were happy if they were able to give some reason for the faith that was in them. There was in the world of science what was known as a working theory, and he said with reverence, and yet with confidence, that their faith was a working theory of a higher order, and the more educated a man became the more need he felt of some working theory, not merely for the existence of matter and the conservation of energy, for man wanted a working theory which would include not merely atomic influence, but his nature as man. Real faith made for freedom, freedom which brought them a step nearer the great White Throne. They would not expect faith to be incarnated in worn-out forms. They would not be so stupidly conservative as to object to anything which would give a more natural expression to the faith which was in them than those things which had been in use with them in the past. They would not leave things as they were "because it is such a nuisance to make a change," or because they liked them so. There was no opposition between a reverence of things of the past and a realisation of the needs of the present.

EVENING MEETING.

After tea a public meeting was held in the Memorial Schools, Major-General JACOB in the chair, and there was a crowded attendance.

The CHAIRMAN, after an opening hymn, spoke of the untrammelled position which Unitarians occupied with regard to Christian doctrines. In recent years discovery had been made of great moral precepts which in the past had been given only a secondary place. Belief about Christ had been mistaken for belief in Christ. It was now becoming more widely recognised that the Gospel itself should be preached, and not the accretions which had overgrown it during the centuries. Unitarians had against their will been placed in conflict with other churches, but they had not yet arrived at the time when they could say that their work was done. One great difficulty which they had to contend with was indifferentism, and they must do all they could to banish this obstacle.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD gave an address on "Self-Help in the Liberal Churches." He said Unitarians were apt to think that they were few and scattered, but they should remember that it was a grand thing to be able to stand alone. He wanted them to look upon themselves a little more hopefully. They had nothing to fear from the advance of knowledge, for they could welcome every record of the Divine will. If they acted a little more on the principle of self-help and believed a little more in themselves they would be astonished at their numbers and the success they would win. They must get rid of indifferentism, and remember that a man was accepted pretty much at his own valuation, and a church was too. Let them be faithful to their trust and rally around their old religious home.

The Rev. FLORENCE BUCK spoke on "The Missionary Spirit." She said that one of the essential points in the missionary spirit was the confidence that they had a present message to give, a message that met the needs of the people of the present, a living message which had come to their own hearts and which might bring comfort and peace to other hearts if it could only reach them. The missionary spirit, again, was a spirit of service, and it included the spirit of sacrifice.

The Rev. Dr. KLEIN spoke on "The Free Churches at the End of the Nineteenth Century." He personally felt deeply grateful for all that had been achieved by the Unitarian churches. A century ago their churches stood in an inferior position, but possessed of a marvellous faith. The attitude of their churches at the beginning of the nineteenth century was one of the most astounding acts of faith registered in the history of religion. How did they stand to-day? What was faith with the Unitarians at the beginning of the nineteenth century had been translated into fact at the end of the century. Their churches had solved a great problem and had made it possible for men of intellect and of the highest attainments to feel that they could join in Christian worship. The Unitarian churches at the end of the century found themselves doing a great, noble and necessary work.

Addresses were also given by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT on "The Future we are Aiming at," and the Rev. MARION MURDOCK on "Organisation in Church Work," the importance of which she strongly emphasied.

After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the meeting concluded with hymn and prayer.

On the following morning a conference of ministers was held, when the Rev. J. BARRON introduced the subject of "A Minister's Work."

OBITUARY.

MRS. JOSEPH PEARCE, IPSWICH.

THE congregation of the Old Meeting, Ipswich, have lost one of the most generous and devoted of their members by the death of Mrs. Joseph Pearce, who passed away on May 11, at the advanced age of ninety-three. Mrs. Pearce had lived for some twenty-two years as a widow in Ipswich, her late husband having been for many years Borough Accountant, and was throughout that time loyally attached to the Old Meeting. It being impossible to use the chapel, owing to the extensive renovations which are being effected, an impressive funeral service was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday afternoon, prior to cremation at Woking. The service was conducted by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn. How deep was the influence for good exerted by Mrs. Pearce during her long and beneficent life, may be partly seen from the following memorial words, written by an attached friend:—Her home must ever be remembered with gladness by those who entered it. The genuineness, the helpfulness of her who presided there made an atmosphere as rare as it was beautiful. Those who thus saw her knew, if never before, what "real people" were. And she carried that reality wherever she went. To the Unitarian faith she was a firm adherent, and great will be the loss that the friends at the "Old Chapel" will have to face. She has gone, but her life work, her courage, her hope have inspired in her friends a like spirit, and will bring like faith and trust.

In the region of her fearless faith
No hour of darkness marked the approach of death;
But, as the evening splendour was withdrawn,
Fair flushed the light along the hills of dawn.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. Rutt, £1 1s.; B. X., £2; Mrs. Rooke, £1; Mr. Pallister Young, 10s. 6d.; Mr. Bromley, £1 1s.; Miss Durning Smith, £3 3s.; Dr. Courtney Kenny, £1 1s.; Mrs. Robinson, £5 5s.; Mrs. Temple, £1 1s.; Mrs. Frank Jolly, 10s.; Lady Durning Lawrence, £3; Mrs. Griffith, £2 2s.; Mrs. Alfred Hopps, £2.

THE INWARD LIFE.

IF prayer be wishing, it is right to pray for beauty, although the single prayer worth praying in this connection is that of Socrates, the ugly man: "Ye gods, grant me to become beautiful in the inner man; and that whatever outward things I have may be in harmony with those within!" Was it Miss Bremer's prayer? A friend asked her in her growing fame, "How do you feel now that so many persons come to see you?" "I wish that I were handsomer," was the honest and womanly reply. All women wish that; and all men wish all women to be beautiful. And since to have beauty is to have added privilege of blessing, it is right to be glad that one is beautiful—glad with that kind of gladness in which thankfulness and humility and simplicity find room to nest. Chadwick is right;-it is possible to be—

Not proud because thou art so beautiful—
Not proud, but glad of heart
To feel thy glorious beauty is a part
Of all the beauty that is anywhere
On land or sea, or in the gleaming air;
Such gladness is less proud than dutiful.

Only, to help your boy or girl bear well the gift, teach them with Robert Browning's lines to hold it as a trust:—

Where is the use of the lips' red charm,
The heaven of hair, the pride of the brow,
And the blood that blues the inside arm,
Unless we turn, as the soul knows how,
The earthly gift to an end divine?

Splendour from within! It is the only thing which makes the real and lasting splendour without. Trust that inevitable law of self-expression. Be, not seem! Be, to seem! Be beautiful, and you soon will appear so to all who love you and beauty. Within lies the robing-room; it is the spirit's beauty that makes fair the face even for the evening's company. Illumination must begin in the soul—the face catches glory only from that side. The spirit's beauty, that which the work and wear and pain of life do so much to render exquisite, is the only beauty that outlasts the work and wear and pain. Have you no friend to whom, if you ever think at all of the plainness of the poor worn face, your next thought is—"But your soul shines through already: what a beautiful angel you are going to make!"

To become ever more and more beautiful—what a beautiful destiny! May we not look forward to a time even on this earth, when, in a sense Paul hardly meant, "we shall all come to the perfect man, the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ"? The Jesus-face which haunts the painters with its even brows and grave sweet regard is but an ideal, a poet's dream of what ought to be. That, or something better yet, is what our far-off children may become. Think of the mornings in the distant generations when many men and women shall be as beautiful upon the streets as the fairest and the purest of to-day; when the homes shall be full of gentle, noble faces, because the laws of living shall be known to be obeyed; when a man's sickness, if self-acquired, shall be his shame; and when to have a child will be holiness unto the Lord! Our Whittier foretells that time:

A glory shines before me
Of what mankind shall be—
Pure, generous, brave and free;

A dream of man and woman,
Diviner, but still human;
Of richer life, where Beauty
Walks hand in hand with Duty.

Our Emerson foretells it—a time "when the Ought, when Duty, shall be one thing with Science, with Beauty, and with Joy." William C. Gannett.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

If you read the "Children's Column" last week, and remember what it was about, you will perhaps like to have this week a little story in illustration of some things that you read there.

Far away in the Highlands of Scotland, a little boy was brought up in a cottage home; his father was a poor shepherd, and Duncan was an only child. A happy life he led, and good parents he had; he loved the wild life of the hills, and cared more to follow his father and the dogs than to go to school and sit in doors. But his father kept him steadily at school, and though they were very poor he was carefully taught, and was a fairly good boy, though rather wild and wilful. Every night the father took the big Bible and read something out of it, generally out of the Psalms, which Scotch people love so dearly. Many a verse remained in Duncan's memory; and when he sat watching the sheep he thought of the Psalm about the Shepherd and the sheep, and the still waters by which the Shepherd led them; and so he learnt to see the truth and feel the beauty of many a Psalm, in his own simple life.

But after a while a sad change came and ended Duncan's happy country life. His parents both died, and he was sent to live in Glasgow with an uncle. The uncle was out at work all day, and often out all evening, too, and he took little care of Duncan; and he, young as he was, had to run about the streets and try to pick up what pence he could by odd jobs. He soon found that he got most jobs down by the wharves and piers where the ships arrived and set sail, so he was usually there; and there he had many companions.

Duncan was miserable enough at first, and he had many a cry of wretchedness as he lay down at night and thought of his home hills, and the sheep, and the sunshine and fresh air. But by degrees he got used to his life, and found pleasures even in it; and he learnt to play as roughly and rudely as any of the other street boys, and to quarrel and use bad language, too.

One day, whilst waiting about for a job, a party of boys began to play, and before very long they began to dispute and quarrel; words were thrown recklessly about, and it really seemed as if the lads were trying who could be noisiest and rudest and most violent. If there was anything to choose, Duncan was about the worst. A young man had just landed from a steamer, and whilst waiting for his luggage to come ashore he watched the boys; and when his box was brought from the steamer he called for a boy to carry it. In an instant the quarelling stopped, and all the lads rushed to offer to carry it; but he chose out Duncan, who proudly shouldered it and ran off beside the young man. As they went they talked. The gentleman asked Duncan about his work, his home, and everything; and long before they reached the house to which he had to carry the box, Duncan had poured out all his story, and told his name, and about his parents, his old home and the hills, and the dogs and sheep.

Then the gentleman said, "Look here, Duncan, you have got not one tongue but two. When you were quarelling with those boys you flung bad words about as if you were scattering sand; and when you talk to me you talk like a sensible boy. Which did you learn from your father?"

Duncan coloured up to his hair, and did not answer.

"Don't you think sometimes that your father and mother are near you and can hear what you say? Would they know you, I wonder?"

Still Duncan was silent; his thoughts were far away. The streets vanished from his mind, as he still trudged silently along with the box on his shoulder.

"Tongue, did he say? Tongue?" It kept singing on in Duncan's ears.

And then from the far past, away in his Highland home, rose up before him the picture of the kitchen fire where they used to sit, those three, in the evenings—the supper in the black pot over the wood fire; the sheep-dogs lying in the warmth; and the dear mother with her hands upon her lap; the father with the open Bible. And out of the past—or was it a message from heaven where the father and mother now were?—came clear to him the words which he had known so well: "There is not a word in my tongue, but lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether. Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways." Duncan did not know anything about what he felt; he only knew that it was utterly impossible for him to use wicked words again. He knew, he saw, that God was beside him and could hear. He had never known it before, though he had often heard it. Now he knew it. It had come to him in that message in the Psalm, from the days of his childhood.

They reached the end of their walk. The box was set down. The gentleman wondered at Duncan's silence, but he looked in his face and saw a far-away look in his eyes and so gentle a look on his face that he asked no questions. He put a sixpence into Duncan's hand, and as he still did not speak, but stood still, he put his hand on his shoulder, and said: "Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile," and went into the house.

Another message from home! Duncan knew those words, too.

Away he flew—fast, fast; he panted to be free. He ran till he came beyond the town, to a field, where the sun was shining, and there he flung himself down upon the grass. He did not think, he did not cry, he did not speak or move. He lay still; and the words sang on in the old home tones, "Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways. For there is not a word in my tongue, but lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether." "Keep thy tongue from evil and thy lips from speaking guile!"

For some time that was all that came to him. He looked up into the sky above him as he lay, it was blue and clear, almost as he used to see it as he lay on the hills near the sheep. A great sea-gull passed across the blue, with its white wings shining in the sun. And then a great peace seemed to come upon him, from the clear sky and the beautiful bird; and, without his knowing how, the dear old Psalm came to him again: "Search me, O God, and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." He did not quite know what it meant. Was the blue sky the way everlasting, and was the white bird going there? He did not know, but they were beautiful, and whenever he heard or thought of those words again he saw that sky and bird, and they seemed to belong together. He rose up, and walked quietly back to his uncle's; and not till he got there did he once think about his sixpence, or know how much it was.

I cannot say that Duncan never used a wicked word again; but whenever he did he seemed to feel someone standing by him, and he felt guilty; and a dim thought of the blue sky and the white bird flitted across his mind, and he felt that he had seen and knew what was good. And so he grew strong and true and brave, and the temptation to use bad words quite left him.

And never did he forget that afternoon in Glasgow, or the gentleman and his walk with him.

THE SURRENDERED HEART.

A heart be mine that sinks or swells
In lowly prayer or lofty praise,
Whose thoughts, like distant minster bells,
Chime sweet and low through chequered ways;

A heart that sees what latent good
May lurk in transient forms of ill,
And, charming passion's serpent brood,
Lies low before thee and is still;

A heart that, wandering through the wilds,
Is stayed on thee in perfect peace;
Whose trust and wonder are the child's,
Whose loves have an immortal lease;

A servant's heart—ah no, a son's
That, found of thee in gain or loss,
Oft communes with thy holy ones
Or on the mount or on the cross!

My heart upon thine altar lies;
Thrice-blessed Light! thrice-sacred Fire!
Consume the unworthy sacrifice,
Though perish self upon the pyre.

TOWARDS UNITY OF FAITH.

"IF controversy is ever to cease, it will not be by good-natured indifference to all earnest conviction, but by a sympathy profound enough to understand it; by a charity, not of easy indulgence, but of genuine insight; by a full trust in the under truth that feeds the roots of all our faiths. There is no short cut, no lazy path, to a true Christian love. It does not consist in mere reaction from sectarian rigour; in dislike of all exact beliefs; in outcries against fanaticism and cold-hearted taste for 'moderation'; in turning the blind side of the mind to all that lies beyond the secular moralities. Real charity is not negative—a simple freedom from antipathies; but positive—a reverential sympathy with what is true and fair and good in the mixed products of our humanity, and through this, a tender allowance for the rest. It is a grace of open eye. To feel charity towards a sin, you must understand the temptation; towards a sorrow, you must know its depth; towards an erring creed, you must appreciate its meaning and its ground. In the oldest, if not the most momentous controversy of Christendom—in the controversy which divides Unitarians from churches called orthodox—I find a mutual misunderstanding of an extraordinary kind, to explain which will go far to remove it; and to remove it is to prepare the way for conscious approximation of Christians the most widely separate."

So wrote Dr. MARTINEAU fourteen years ago in his article "A Way out of the Trinitarian Controversy," published in the Christian Reformer and now included in the second volume of his "Essays, Reviews and Addresses." The plea of that article is that when we penetrate beneath the formal expressions of the creed, and understand what is the actual object of worship, "the Father" of the Unitarian and "the Son" of the Trinitarian are found in their spiritual essence to be indistinguishable, so that by the way of sympathy a much nearer approach towards unity of faith should be possible than the customary attitude of contending theologians would lead one to expect.

Following out the thought of this suggestive article, we have now received from the earnest and courageous Vicar of Yardley Wood a further contribution in the same direction from the Trinitarian side, in his striking "Theological Eirenicon," the second half of which is published in our present issue. That a broad-minded clergyman of the Church of England should think it worth while to make such a plea, and we may add, should have the courage publicly to make it in so frank and unequivocal a manner, is in itself a very hopeful sign of the times, which we are thankful to be able to set against other recent and very different manifestations of theological temper. And we cannot but believe that the plea itself, if earnestly considered, in the spirit in which it is made, must be fruitful of a better understanding and an enrichment of religious life, for those who now seem to be so widely separated as Unitarians and Trinitarians, and yet are essentially one in their conception of the religious life for all children of the living GOD.

We do not propose here to enter into an examination of Mr. BEEBY'S essay, but desire at once to meet his plea for more charitable and more discerning judgment on both sides with the most cordial response. We would commend the essay to our readers' most earnest attention, and for the better understanding of the subject, and especially of what is meant from the Unitarian point of view by the underlying truth hidden in the ecclesiastical doctrine of the Trinity, we will quote a further passage from Dr. DRUMMOND'S Hibbert Lectures—a passage which follows immediately on that quoted this week by Mr. BEEBY:—

> The Love of God was the original source of the new religion, and occupied the central place in the Christian consciousness. But it was in Christ that this love was revealed; in him the word of God to man had spoken with unexampled clearness and power. He was felt to be the beloved Son, the elder brother, the leader and inspirer of the whole movement. In him, as filled with the life of God, many a weary and doubting soul found rest, and rose out of the darkness and sin of earth into the heavenly light and love. Words of comfort dropped upon the oppressed heart, and divine thoughts stole, as with the footsteps of angels, into the troubled mind; and at length that Reason which had come in partial flashes of truth to sage and prophet, seemed to have risen with its full-orbed splendour. Faith in the sonship of man rested upon the sonship of him who had manifested, and brought home to human consciousness, the eternal life which was, and is, for ever with God. But when this life passed into the hearts of believers, and bound them together in a holy community, it was recognised as the Spirit of God, spreading as a diffused breath among the brotherhood, and, like the vital air, kindling and sustaining the life of the soul. This common life which wrought within the several members of the Church was felt not to be a mere attribute of man, but an indwelling of God, who distributed spiritual gifts, and shaped the organism of the society according to his own good pleasure. These deep experiences gave a three-fold direction to Christian veneration. Love, Reason, Holiness, were all alike divine, and yet to human thought were all distinct from one another. In the old philosophy they were conceived as essences in which men might participate, thereby becoming marked with the corresponding qualities. But God, so far from participating in them, was the fount of their being; for, in the language of Augustine, "He is what he has." What we are apt to describe as attributes belonged to the very substance of his being, and in that substance found their unity. We cannot follow the long controversy to which the metaphysical interpretation of religious experience gave rise. It marks a daring flight of human reason; and it may be that the various positions maintained from time to time by the majority of the Church were necessary correctives of one-sided tendencies or of rash speculations. But the interpretation which required centuries to reach its final form is not part of the primitive religion. It belongs to philosophy rather than to faith, and has stood in the way of the very experiences on which it was originally founded; for the majestic ideas of Greek philosophy which gave it shape have, to a large extent, died out of our modern thought, and to the great mass of Christians are simply unintelligible. Theology has its rightful place, and the uplifting power of sublime speculations cannot be denied. But the great Teacher chose another path, and the humble Christian may find life and strength in his faith in God as the loving Father of mankind; in Jesus Christ as the Beloved Son, the first-born among many brothers; and in the Holy Spirit of God, whereby the hearts of men are sanctified and drawn together in a unity which leaves untouched the free and beautiful play of diverse tendencies and gifts. God is Spirit; God is Light; God is Love—these are the fruitful results which surpass all the ecclesiastical creeds, and their day is yet to come.

It is a pleasure to acknowledge the generous terms in which Mr. BEEBY speaks of Unitarians and the influence they have exerted on the religious life of the Christian Church at large; and we would call special attention to the sentence, in which it is said: "If the Unitarian understand by Fatherhood all that ATHANASIUS meant by Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, he has gained the truth which the mere professor of the Trinitarian formula may readily miss." Of the critical remarks which follow, in regard to the quality of the religion of Unitarians, we may find another opportunity to speak.

UNITARIAN AND TRINITARIAN:

A THEOLOGICAL EIRENICON.

By the Rev. C. E. Beeby, B.D., Vicar of Yardley Wood, and Author of "Creed and Life."

II.

7. LET us now compare the teaching of some modern Divines among Churchmen and Unitarians. "God is Power and Wisdom and Love. God is revealed fully and perfectly in Christ. God is revealing Himself ever more and more perfectly in the souls of men. That is the sum and substance of the doctrine of the Trinity," says Dr. Rashdall, "as defined by the most unimpeachable exponents of orthodox Theology." On the other hand, he adds: "When, therefore, some modern Divines talk about an intercourse or society subsisting between the Father and the Son, meaning by the Son a conscious being, distinct alike from God, the world, and the assumptus homo, Jesus Christ, they are using language which an orthodox scholastic Theologian would probably have pronounced to be sheer Tritheism." "The threefold plurality in the inner nature of the Universal Soul," says Canon Wilberforce, "is now recognised by every reverent thinker as being not three distinct wills, consciences, intellects, but as one Elemental Substance following the universal law of Being, Manifestation, and Outflowing Influence. The names Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are a mode of expressing the intense nearness that the all-inclusive Spirit of Love claims with every department, every need, every mental attitude, of the life of man. In their deepest meaning they signify Love in essential being, Love in manifestation, Love in eternal procession."

There are few modern Unitarians who will refuse to receive the doctrine of the Trinity thus relieved of popular misinterpretations.

Among Unitarians we have the witness of Dr. James Drummond who recognizes that "there were certain elements in Christian experience which, when taken up and interpreted by Greek philosophy, necessarily resulted in this doctrine; and though we may believe that the form and the terminology of the doctrine were derived from a foreign source, we may nevertheless admit the reality of fundamental Christian facts which imparted to it all its religious vitality."*

In his Essay, "A Way out of the Trinitarian Controversy," of which I venture to present a summary account, Dr. James Martineau offers an explanation of mutual misunderstanding between Unitarians and Trinitarians which should, as he hoped, go far to remove that misunderstanding in the minds of those who approach the subject with serious intent.

Unitarians believe in One God who is Author and Sustainer of the Universe, Father of Spirits, Moral Governor, Eternal Judge of men, the Providence of history, Source of nature, Soul of souls, Lord of the earth, and Fountain of grace, especially revealed in Jesus Christ, in whom He dwelt. Trinitarians believe in One God in Three Persons, but Dr. Martineau recognises that, though many misunderstand the doctrine from want of knowledge of the technical terms employed, and might justly be charged with Tritheism, every theological scholar is well aware that "the word 'Person' is not to be understood in its ordinary sense, to denote a separate free agent, detached from all others by individuality of essence and will." In the common ground, the universal element of divine thought, Personality implies concentration and distinction of qualities.

Now in the Creed of the Church the only attribute which distinguishes the First Person, "the Father," is that of "Maker of all things," and even this attribute is His only as intending Cause; the Creative act is characteristically the Son's, through whom all things were made, and without whom has nothing been made that was made. Every transaction of nature or of grace in this world is, without exception, attributed to the Son. Not one fact or phenomenon is due to the distinctive agency of the Father. The moment anything arises, it is the Son. Nothing remains to be said, then, of the Father, except that He is the Father, of whom is the Son. In short, to the believer who starts, with the Creed, from the thought of God as intending Cause, or potentiality only, the Son becomes at once a necessary complement of the thought of God as Father. The manifested phase of the Divine existence, no matter what the medium or form of manifestation be, is the Son, "as the Word or utterance of an otherwise mute Infinitude," "God speaking out in phenomena and fact." The human word follows on the thought it speaks; filiation is successive. But we cannot conceive God as ever an infinite Solitude, a bare immensity, without expression. The co-eternity of the Son with the Father is "an attempt to correct our first false impression that God existed for a period before he acted; that his manifestation followed, after an interval, upon his essence; it denies that the difference is one of time; brings the two, in that respect, into coalescence; and for the relation of after and before bids us substitute that of ever-rising phenomena and ever-abiding ground."

Respecting the third Person in the Trinity, "the separation of this personality from the others, as not proper to be merged in them, is founded on a feeling deep and true—namely, that the human spirit is not a mere part of nature." We are persuaded of something diviner within us akin to the Supreme Mind Himself. We need living communion, like unto like, spirit with spirit. To open this communion is "the function, truly of quite a special kind, reserved in the doctrine of the Church for the Holy Ghost."

Such is Dr. Martineau's rendering of the doctrine of the Trinity, and so far he is prepared to recognise it as consistent with the faith of Unitarians.

Now there are two points on which misunderstanding arises, beyond that which arises on the part of the Trinitarians from a misreading of their own technical term "person," which creates prejudice against Unitarians. The professor of the Trinitarian formula supposes that the Unitarian believes in the One God as the Father alone and denies the Son. But in spite of the fact that the Unitarian calls upon God as "the Father" nominally, he would be more justly accused of denying the Father than of denying the Son. For it is what the professor of the orthodox formula understands by the Son that he understands by the Father. The misunderstanding arises from the fact that the nominal Unitarian and the nominal Trinitarian approach the Creed from two different points of view. Although it cannot be said that Unitarians deny "the Father" of the Creed, the mere potential Cause, the Silent Abyss, yet this idea is left out of account, when they speak of Creed, as a cold and barren abstraction of thought, and they believe primarily in God from the experience of Him in the warm glow of the actual creation. "Did Trinitarians perceive this, they would be less disposed to charge us with believing in only a cold, distant, and awful God. The charge is founded on the supposition that we believe only in their first Person, and leave out the rest; in which case it would indeed be true. But tell them that the object of our belief is their second Person, not their first, and they will feel how false the accusation; for it is precisely around him, as the very centre and solar glory of their faith, that all their trust and reverence move, and in him that their affections burn and glow. If it is in him that we also put our faith, though under another name, then we are at one with all Christendom in this very focus and fervour of its religious life."

Dr. Martineau, on the other hand, very generously explains in favour of Trinitarians, that, whereas Unitarians commonly think of "the Son" as Jesus of Nazareth, Trinitarians, when they speak of "the Son," understand the Eternal Image, Word, or Life of God, manifested in the human conditioned life. They do not start with the historical Jesus, that which was born, and from that point of chronology expand the image till it be enthroned in the heavens and made an equal element with the Eternal God. Whatever conceptions many professors of the orthodox formula may entertain, this is not the point of view of the Creed of the Orthodox. "'The Son' comes before his mind, not as an historical personage at all, but as God's eternal expression of Himself—the thought He puts forth in all His works and ways; manifested through all ages by nature and history; but concentrated with unique brilliancy in the character and existence, the holy life and redeeming work of Jesus, in whom the Spirit so dwelt without measure that he was the very 'Word made flesh,' the divine perfection on the scale, and united with the incidents, of humanity. In this sense, the faith professed in 'the Son' is so far from being an idolatry, that it is identical, under change of name, with the Unitarian's worship of Him who dwelt in Christ. He who is the Son in the one Creed is the Father in the other; and the two are agreed, not indeed by any means throughout, but in that which constitutes the pith and kernel of both faiths. Let the advocates of each compare them together from this point of view, with mind open, not to words only, but to the real thoughts they contain, and with temper sensitive to sympathy rather than to divergency, and there is hope that we may yet all come into the unity of faith, and true knowledge of the Son of God."*

Is there such serious difference between these several interpretations of the doctrine of God as to make it proper to characterise the one Christian and to withhold the title of Christian from the other? Who shall dare refuse to embrace as fellow-Christians in the common faith those who, equally with ourselves, are willing to adopt the theological language of the New Testament Scriptures in their characterisation of our common Lord and Saviour? Who will deny that the theology of the Scripture is not sufficient? Who will venture to anathematise those who refuse to add to the faith of the Catholic Church of the New Testament Scriptures a profession of a system of mere verbal affirmations, based on an obsolete philosophy, which carry no meaning in human understanding?

8. Though I am well aware of the retort which is likely enough to be thrown at me by some of my fellow-Churchmen of the baser sort, this much I am bold publicly to avow as a Churchman, that I feel we should all be the poorer without those interpretations of the common faith which have been given to the world by such Christian teachers among Unitarians as Channing, Stopford Brooke, Freeman Clarke, and Martineau. For my own part I should be ashamed not to recognise the learning and intelligence of Unitarians as a body, or to deny the Christian service which has been rendered by men whose protests against many degrading doctrines, formerly held by Churchmen, have not been without fruit, and whose influence has been felt far and wide in the Christian world in the modification of our views of "eternal punishment," the Atonement, and the Divine Fatherhood.

Modern Unitarians generally will repudiate a doctrine of Christ which should divest him of permanent relationship with the Divine nature. In respect of the doctrine of the Trinity they are surely without understanding who imagine that the mere mechanical distinction of the three "Persons" is of any value in itself, apart from the ethical significance of the threefold Name and its realisation in Christian consciousness. If the Unitarian understand by Fatherhood all that Athanasius meant by Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, he has gained the truth which the mere professor of the Trinitarian formula may readily miss. Many modern Unitarians seem to me to be far nearer orthodox doctrine in its inward and essential meaning than the average Churchman. In respect of the witness to Christian truth, Tritheism may more justly be refused the designation of Christian—being more entirely destructive of the Revelation of the Gospel—than the older form of Unitarian faith. Unitarianism exists to uphold the doctrine of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, as one God. This witness is not unneeded, and, so far, Unitarianism must be welcomed by all true orthodox believers. The conduct of some who, professing liberal opinions in the Church, are accustomed to speak with bated breath and holy horror of Unitarians is, to my mind, most offensive and cowardly. Churchmen, and we may add members of other denominations, who have to their spiritual benefit adopted many of the ethical interpretations of Christian doctrine for which Unitarians have long stood, whose difference with them in respect of many other doctrines, which they maintain, is verbal rather than real or mental, who yet refuse them the common Christian communion and fellowship, manifest a spirit which, however correct their interpretation of doctrine may in fact be, is very far from the mind of the Divine Master.

At the same time I believe that it has been a serious loss to Unitarians that they should have cut themselves off from the tradition of the larger Christian Church, and have become isolated as a denomination. In spite of the services rendered by many among them, one cannot help feeling that there is something lacking in Unitarians as a body. They approach Christianity from a too exclusively intellectual standpoint. To the outside world they seem to be deficient in spirituality, except of the cold intellectual order, because of the self-denying ordinance which they apparently have imposed upon themselves to suppress the religious emotions. In spite of their insistence on the human side of Christology, they seem to want something of the humanity of the Christian religion. They separate themselves from popular religious movements (except that of education) because of the shock which these give their cultured taste. Their sensitiveness to the appeal from the intellectual side of religion gives them a certain aloofness and seeming harshness.

The deep compassion and sympathy of the humanity of Christ has been best preserved in the tradition of the Church, because there the humanity is seated in the very bosom of God. Where Christ is followed as a teacher, and God is worshipped, though the Fatherhood of God be exalted as a theological doctrine, the Fatherhood will lack the depth and intensity which it has in the doctrine of the Trinity, where humanity is fully recognised by making Christ one with God. This is the great secret of the orthodox doctrine. The inwardness of the doctrine of the Trinity, its human interest, its ethical and spiritual significance, lies in the realisation in consciousness that God is Christ. The tradition of this essential gospel, for its reissue in our own age, has been historically preserved in the dogma that Christ is God.

9. In the end I must avow my belief that behind the profession of Unitarianism and Trinitarianism is a more real difference of mental aptitudes and spiritual qualities. Catholics and Ritualists, with their sacerdotal system corresponding to their conception of a God estranged from the world, who interposes by miracle and makes His presence known by supernatural acts, are much more like the Unitarians of the last century than they are like the orthodox believer who has entered into the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity. Science has taught many modern Unitarians to approach Christian belief from the point of view of the Incarnation, of the unfolding of the order of Evolution under the impulse of an Immanent uplifting Divinity. Yet many Unitarians continue to approach the world problem from the Arian point of view, and this is not less true of the average Churchman. The doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood, precious as it is when invested with the character which it partakes as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," in contrast with the harsh view of God as an Eastern Despot, stern Legislator, or Judge of Assize, yet helps to maintain an anthropomorphic conception of Deity, and implies a very different point of view from that which is the basis of the Greek Creed, the Universal Eternal spiritual Being immanent as the Light and Life of the Cosmos.

It is the point of view from which we approach the Creed which determines our theological denomination, rather than the Church we belong to, or the profession of formulas. There are, in short, Trinitarians among professing Unitarians and Unitarians among professing Trinitarians, honest men on both sides who, captivated by the external formula, fail to see beneath to the vital substance of the belief enshrined. There are men who are constituted essentially metaphysical and ideal, and there are others, perhaps the majority, whose minds dwell in the region of sensuous phenomena, which they distinguish often as historical fact. To them there is no object and no reality except it be an object perceptible to the senses. These are the matter-of-fact Englishmen who regard the Idealist as dwelling in a dreamland of pure imagination. The objects of the Ideal world seem to them to be no objects and to have no permanent value. The Revelation to them is the concrete fact, matter, solid stuff, something tangible, they will tell you. This is historical Christianity, the only Christianity which is worth anything at all. Such a fact as the revivification of the body of Jesus laid in the tomb, is the fact of eternal worth. For my own part I conclude it is very little use to attempt to introduce these concrete fact, historical people into the region of the ideal world. Now these two minds are represented, respectively, in the Apostles' or Roman Creed and the Nicene or Greek Creed. The Nicene Creed originates in the ideal world of Eternal Being and descends to earth to interpret the historical fact; the Roman or Western Creed originates with the concrete historical fact and rises to the world above, but never reaches to the Greek metaphysical idea of Universal, Eternal, Immanent, comprehensive Being. In the one you start with the phenomenal fact, of time and history, and the witness to the Eternal is by the miracle. The birth of Jesus is accordingly an isolated event in history. In the other you start in the ideal and metaphysical world with One Eternal Being, and all else is limitation, conditioning, condescension, uplifting, realisation. God is the Life of the World, the Source and Fountain of all natural processes, which are an outcome of the everflowing life of the Immanent and Eternal Energy.

And that is the difference between real Unitarians and real Trinitarians.

DR. MARTINEAU AND DR. WELLDON.

Sir,—I am sorry I did not make my meaning quite clear. Allow me, therefore, to add that I look on the Theological or Doctrinal Christian World as consisting of Unitarians and Trinitarians, and those who, having learnt of both parties, are walking in that via media, which is so often, also, the way of Truth. That the ranks of the latter section are continually being increased both here and in America, from the holders of Trinitarian views, is shown by many significant facts—I wish I could say the same of the Unitarian section. But I suppose they have had to wage too fierce and prolonged a warfare against the unscriptural errors of Trinitarianism and Calvinism to be able, to any considerable extent, to recognise that via media as the way of Truth, till another generation has arisen. But that need not prevent us from rejoicing that the number of those Trinitarians who are learning from Athanasius and a host of his modern disciples, the true meaning of the great Christian truths for which he contended so faithfully, is continually increasing, and fifty years hence will probably have won the day. As they increase, the upholders of a Trinitarian and heathenish doctrine of the Trinity will "happily" decrease, large as their number may now seem to be, and the Christian Church generally will recognise and devoutly rejoice in "Jesus, the Son of God, our Saviour," who has come to make all who receive him sharers in his own Divine Sonship and its Eternal blessedness. It is the Tritheistic Trinity of the "Athanasian Creed," still held by a large though happily decreasing number of earnest and devout Christians, that I venture to protest again as earnestly as I plead for the scriptural truth of the divine and eternal Sonship of the "Great Captain of our Salvation," Jesus Christ, and which might now be held by the great body of "English Presbyterians," had they not under the beguiling name of "Unitarian" been led to doubt or deny the authority of the Fourth Gospel.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

SIR,—There is a consideration which is apt to be overlooked in discussions on Temperance v. Total Abstinence. No one doubts that, in the present state of society, intoxicating drinks are a temptation to many. Then do not moderate drinkers incur a grave responsibility when they use them as common articles of food? That which is dangerous to some (I fear we ought to say to many) ought surely not to be habitually on our tables, and offered as a matter of course to all comers. Therefore I am a total abstainer by habit, though unpledged. I, for one, will not have alcohol brought to table for me.

It is not "the devil in solution," nor "an absolutely useless poison," but while some are tempted to misuse it till the former description appears true, ought we to take on ourselves the responsibility of treating it as if it were harmless food?

C. A. MARTINEAU.

1, Clifton-place, Sussex-square, W.

BRADFORD, MANCHESTER.

THE Mill-street Free Church, Bradford, was formally opened on Saturday afternoon last with a religious service, of which the devotions were led by Rev. W. E. Atack, resident missionary, and the sermon preached by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal. An impressive discourse was based upon the words addressed by Jesus to the woman of Samaria. About 300 people were present, including representatives from the various churches in the district, and nearly all the district ministers. The building seems remarkably well adapted for its purpose; it is light and airy, and the classrooms on either side—eight in all—are admirably arranged. The cost of the land, building, and furnishing has been about £3,000. Mr. Tom Cook is the architect, and Messrs. Hill and Hayes the builders. The public hall has now been vacated, and all branches of the work are transferred to the new building. Already the Sunday scholars number about 300, and will, therefore, test from the outset the capacity of their new home. On Saturday it seemed in every way satisfactory. One or two of the evening speakers were not heard very well by those at the back; but one could not say the building was at fault, for the rest were heard distinctly enough. After service tea was served, preparations having been made in the classrooms. In the evening a well-attended meeting was held, Mr. G. W. R. Wood, J.P., President of the Manchester District Association, in the chair, and amongst the speakers were Mr. John Dendy, and the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, C. J. Street, and H. E. Dowson. A number of apologies had been received, and amongst them two from local orthodox ministers, who were brotherly and sympathetic in their expressions of good wishes.

Mr. WOOD, in his remarks, said the idea of the Association in opening up work in that district was not aggression against any other Church, but it was the manifestation of a desire to undertake some of the uplifting Christian work that was so much needed there and elsewhere.

Mr. JOHN DENDY said that in erecting that church they undertook a serious responsibility, and declared themselves desirous of participating in an important religious undertaking. What were the layman's duties? Some were apt to think that a fairly regular attendance and liberal subscriptions to keep the thing going was all that was required; but that narrow view was one of the causes which had brought about the decrease of interest in Church life and other of our institutions. Their connection with that movement meant that if they were honest they were going to carry their religion into their business, and live in such a way as that men might say of them, "They, indeed, belong to the right sort of Church." To that end they must train their scholars, speak plainly to them about purity, courtesy, refinement, that they might not grow up ignorant of those things, but be thoroughly equipped to fight the great fight of a manly life. As laymen they were to exhibit forebearance—the most inconsistent thing in the world was a quarrelsome Church. They were to make the best use of the powers God had given them, and strive to approach Him. They were going to do what they could to start the young people fairly in their intellectual life, and provide them the opportunities for higher and better education; they must also purify their amusements and provide wholesome recreation. To see God and to know God was their great object. They must try to get at the truth in theology, but the great need of their souls was to live the religious life, and to feel the love of God.

The Rev. J. E. CARPENTER referred to the industrial characteristics of the neighbourhood, and said there was something much higher in their natures which needed expression. A real Church fostered and spread life; but that was a function which neither ministers nor people could carry out alone. The minister could only give what he had received, and if there was no active sympathy between him and the people the Church would be dead. That life has most vigour which perpetually creates for itself new forms, especially the forms which appeal to the sympathy and needs of the people around. In those classrooms they had the mutual means of building up a life of manifold forms. There would be diversity of views—one would desire to spread the life in one way and another in another way; but they must centralise their energy and be actuated by the same spirit, agreed that there shall be loyalty to the fundamental principles of their religion. They should consider there the great questions of life, and make every effort to meet the great social needs of which all were conscious, in the spirit of those who rank as disciples of Jesus.

The Rev. C. J. STREET, who when Secretary of the Association did so much to establish and make possible the Forward Movement in the Manchester District, recalled the various steps taken, especially in opening up the work in Bradford. He believed our Gospel could be presented so as to win the allegiance and admiration of the working-classes; in fact, some of our working-class churches were the strongest and healthiest we possessed. He was glad they had called theirs a Free Church, and he hoped they would carry their religious faith to practical issues, and uplift the neighbourhood socially and morally.

Other speakers followed, and the proceedings were interspersed with vocal items rendered by the choir and friends. It was a most encouraging and successful opening, and everything augured well for the future of this Forward Movement effort.

CILIAU AERON, CARDIGANSHIRE.

OPENING OF THE NEW CHAPEL.

ON Wednesday and Thursday, May 9 and 10, the quarterly meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Association were held at Ciliau Aeron, the occasion being taken to celebrate the opening of the new chapel. The scheme at which the congregation has been working hard for the past eight years is now completed, and the whole of the £1,300 which it has cost has been received or promised.

Ciliau Aeron is a rural parish on the south side of the river Aeron, about four miles from Aberaeron in Cardigan Bay. The new chapel stands in an elevated position about half a mile from the main road between Lampeter and Aberaeron, and is a stone building of pleasant aspect.

On the gables of the chancel and the main roof are stone crosses, the roof being of grey Welsh slates. Over the doorway is the following inscription:—"Ciliau Aeron Chapel. The congregation assembling at this place was first founded about the year 1650. The first chapel on this site was registered for public worship, Oct. 8, 1756. The present edifice was erected in 1899."

On entering the building two features are particularly noticeable—the timbered roof and the chancel. The roof is formed of curved timbers and open nearly up to the ridge, there being only a small flat portion of boarded ceiling. The walls have a stucco face, such as is frequently used in churches, which finishes against the stonework of the chancel arch, and the varnished woodwork of the dado. The pulpit is on the left side of the chancel, and on the right a fine American organ has been placed. In the chancel there is a mullioned window, filled in with leaded glass. The side windows are in glass of a light warm tint, giving a cheerful effect. The seating accommodation is for 225 adults. The total cost of the chapel has been about £880.

The two days' proceedings at the opening were marked by much enthusiasm. On Wednesday evening the service was conducted by the Rev. William James, B.A., J.P. (Llandyssul), and the preachers were the Revs. T. Arthur Thomas (Llandyssul) and the Rev. R. C. Jones (Lampeter). In spite of the unfavourable state of the weather, there was a large congregation.

On Thursday the weather was all that could be desired, and it is estimated that the assembly numbered between 800 and 900. Every available inch of room inside the building was occupied, and there were hundreds of people outside listening for what they might hear through the open windows.

The devotional part of the service on Thursday morning was conducted by the Rev. John Davies (Allt-y-placa), the preacher being the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, a native of the district. Mr. Jones, who preached in Welsh, took for his texts, Psalm xxvii. 4, and xcv. 6, and having referred to the venerable traditions connected with that chapel, as the mother of all Nonconformist places of worship in Mid-Cardigan, and its renovation and present vigorous life, with a brave outlook into the future, he proceeded to speak in earnest and eloquent terms of "The House of God as a Religious Home," and "The Value of Religious Worship."

At one o'clock a short conference was held, under the presidency of the Rev. John Davies, at which it was resolved, on the motion of Mrs. Jones (Gellifaharen), seconded by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, to ascertain the opinion of the churches as to the desirability of introducing a liturgical form of worship. At the afternoon service the devotional part was conducted in a very helpful and sympathetic manner by the Rev. Carolan Davies (Congregationalist), and powerful sermons were preached by the Revs. J. Davies and William James. Another service was held n the evening, the officiating ministers being the Revs. David Evans, T. J. Jenkins, and John Davies.

As Mr. Davies is the oldest minister in active service in our Cardiganshire churches, it was most fitting that he should be asked to speak the final word. Mr. Jenkins' simple but most effective sermon on the "Leadership of Christ" created a profound impression on the large audience, which listened to it with rapt attention. Collections were taken at all the services, and the amount realised, including subscriptions received from friends present, reached the handsome total of £56.

One of the most pleasing features of the gatherings was the friendship shown by members of other religious communities. The Revs. J. H. Davies and T. Pugh, rector and curate of the parish, were present at all the services, and the Rev. Evan Morris (Calvinistic Methodist), and the Rev. T. Gwilym Evans (Congregationalist) also attended.

In the course of the proceedings a vote of thanks was accorded to the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones for his sermon, and for the many sacrifices which he had made for the cause at Ciliau Aeron. A similar compliment was paid to Mr. Arnold Seaward Tayler, the architect (The Sanctuary, Westminster), and Mr. David Lewis, the contractor (Talgarreg), for the able manner in which they had done their work. Reference was also made to the splendid hospitality of the Ciliau people, who had provided luncheon and tea for their numerous guests free of charge.

On the motion of the Rev. Lewis Williams, minister of the chapel, cordial thanks were accorded to all who had contributed to the success of the meetings.

"LOVE LEADETH ME."

UPON my chamber's pictured wall,
Before my couch this text I see,
Where first and last mine eyes must fall,
The blessed words—
"Love leadeth me!"

The dawn's bright rays the sentence show,
That so may waking joyous be:
At midnight, in the firelight glow
The shining words—
"Love leadeth me!"

It tells how all the day that Love
Lights all my paths its will to see;
And when I sleep keep watch above,
The guardian words—
"Love leadeth me!"

In health, as happy moments fly,
When the sweet chords of life agree,
Or when in pain or grief I sigh,
The precious words—
"Love leadeth me!"

Dear was the hand that wrought this text,
Thinking that I might daily see,
If joyful, sad, serene, perplext,
The tender words—
"Love leadeth me!"

Be it the motto of my life,
In mart or field, on land or sea;
My conquering song in death's dread strife,
The triumph words—
"Love leadeth me!"

Torquay. E. B. RUSSELL.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

BIRMINGHAM is to the Midlands what Newcastle is to the counties of Northumberland and Durham. It is the centre of the district, comprising the counties of Warwick, Worcester, and Stafford, just as Newcastle is the centre of the two northern counties.

The—for want of a better name—Unitarian churches of the Midland district have long been associated together with the common object of promoting the interests of our liberal Christianity. In 1806 a society of Unitarian Christians was established in Birmingham, for Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties, to promote Christian knowledge and the practice of virtue by the distribution of books, and in 1861 a society called the Birmingham District Unitarian Association was established to extend the principles of Unitarian Christianity by preaching, the publication and distribution of books and tracts, and by opening fresh places for worship and Sunday-school instruction. These two societies continued to carry on their work with the aid of voluntary contributions till the year 1866, when the Midland Christian Union was formed and the two societies were amalgamated with it. A monthly periodical, called the "Unitarian Circular for the Birmingham District of Congregations," was started in June, 1858,

To supply persons of the working-class, and young people in a state of transition from Sunday-schools to congregations, with such information regarding neighbouring churches and their institutions as may stimulate and encourage them to constant attendance at worship and perseverance in Sunday-school teaching in which many of them very worthily engage. They require to know that they do not bear the reproach of Christ alone, but that in other localities they have brethren and fellow-workers equally zealous with themselves, who approve of their efforts, and rejoice in their success.

The circular was published at Oldbury at a halfpenny a copy—Nos. 1 and 5 are before me as I write—but I cannot say how long it lasted.

Your Midland letter of last October recorded the change in the name of the Midland Christian Union so as to include the words Presbyterian and Unitarian, and when this became generally known through the reports in the local press of the annual meeting of the Union last March, it drew forth two very strong protests from the Presbyterian ministers in Birmingham. They objected to the coupling together of the words Presbyterian and Unitarian as apt to create a wrong impression on the public mind, the Presbyterian Church of England being Trinitarian in doctrine, and having no sympathy with Unitarianism. One of the writers, however, admitted that the use of the word Presbyterian was legitimate, in so far as it represented the holders of certain church properties, but doctrinally it was a misnomer. It seems to me, however, that it matters little by what name the society is known, if only it succeeds in the good work it tries to do and has been trying to do for nearly a century past, for the area of its operations is much the same now as it was in the days of the Tract Society, though its scope may be wider. Birmingham is still the centre, as it has always been. Last year there were twenty-five congregations included in the Union, and nearly half of these drew part of their funds from Birmingham, mainly from members of the three principal congregations—namely, the Old Meeting, the Church of the Messiah, and Newhall-hill Church. These churches continue to flourish, but, as in other places, they are not crowded. For the first time in the history of the Church of the Messiah a form of service with responses was brought into use both morning and evening about a year ago, and has proved to be generally acceptable to those who attend the services. A similar form had been previously used, but in the evening only. The book used is the "Six Orders of United Service," prepared by Mr. Jacks specially for his congregation. It has already been adopted by three more of our churches, and its use will probably be further extended at no great distance of time.

A further innovation at the same church, which shows that its members are alive to the demands of the age, is the provision now being made for the accommodation of bicycles on the church premises, thus encouraging the use of these carriages on Sundays as well as week-days. It will now be considered quite the correct thing to ride down to church on your bicycle.

The congregation of this church have reason to be proud of their minister and his reputation as a preacher. He was invited to preach this month in the chapel of Harvard University, a great honour, which he was not able to accept, and he has since been appointed Tate Lecturer at Manchester College, Oxford. This appointment is another evidence of the high estimation in which the preaching power of the ministers of our Birmingham churches is held by the College authorities.

A few months ago one of the oldest of our meeting-houses, that at Alcester, was closed. It had long been a struggle to keep it open, but it was found impossible to arouse sufficient interest among the inhabitants of this quiet little country town to make it worth while to continue the effort. It is more than 200 years since the first meeting-house was opened there. This reduces the congregations in the Union to twenty-four.

Another of our chapels in Warwickshire—I mean Kenilworth—has not been used for a long time, nor is there any prospect of its coming into use again at present.

From the dead and dying it is pleasant to turn to signs of fresh life. The Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, has a large and increasing population on the outskirts of Birmingham from which to draw its members, and I am glad to know that it is in a healthy condition. However, like many new churches, it is not without its debt on the building, something for the young and active members to strive to remove a little at a time.

Last autumn our friends at Wolverhampton held a conference with the officers of the Union to consider what steps should be taken to awaken fresh interest in the cause in that town. The intention is to build an iron church, to cost £300 or £400 on their new site, which is an excellent one, and, like Small Heath, is close to a public park. They are now looking out for a young and active minister. As soon as he is found, and a few more subscriptions as well, the scheme will at once be put into operation.

The congregation at Evesham flourishes under the guidance of the Rev. Rudolf Davis. Lately they have very much improved their chapel by putting in stained-glass windows in place of the old ones which were much less pleasing to the eye; they have also enlarged the organ and improved the heating and lighting. The old feeling that our places of worship should be plain in appearance is rapidly passing away—if, indeed, it has not entirely gone—and the opposite tendency has become very general.

I have already spoken of the position Birmingham holds as the centre of the Midland churches. It is the headquarters of the Midland Christian Union, and from the funds of the Union eleven (being nearly half) of the Midland churches draw pecuniary support. The responsibilities of the Committee of the Union are, therefore, not small. In their report just issued they ask for at least £150 additional income to put their finances on a satisfactory basis. For some years past they have been in the pleasant, but unsafe, position of one contributor surpassing all the others in generosity—Mr. Charles Cochrane—and now he is dead a difficulty at once arises.

I have a suggestion to make to our friends in the Midlands by which I think there ought to be no difficulty in raising half the required amount by shilling subscriptions. £75 divided between the twenty-four churches would mean £3 2s. 6d. a year, or sixty-three shilling subscribers from each church. If it is too many to expect from the smaller churches, let the larger ones make up the difference, and the thing would be done. It would largely increase individual interest in the Union, as every subscriber would be a member of the Union under its first rule, and a shilling subscriber would be much easier to replace than a guinea one.

At a Church Extension meeting in Birmingham this month the Bishop of Worcester remarked upon the War Fund raised by the Birmingham Daily Mail as a splendid illustration of what could be accomplished by the little sacrifices and small gifts of the poor. The fund now amounts to £30,000 and upwards. If such a large sum of money can be raised in this way for the relief of physical suffering in a few months time, surely we ought to have no difficulty in getting together the small annual sum asked for by the Union for the promotion of the spiritual welfare of the people.

I should like to call your readers' special attention to your "Provincial Letter" of May 5. It is chiefly composed of a long and stirring appeal to the ministers, delegates, and church secretaries of the twenty-two churches of the Manchester District Association, asking them to suggest ways of giving an impetus to their church life. In their case a large sum of money has already been raised, and they are well supplied, or will be before the year is out, with fine, convenient buildings; but this, the writer says, is not enough. In our own case we spend plenty of money on painted windows, electric lighting, improved heating, additions to the church building or to the organ, and in other ways we add to the comfort and beauty of the house of God; but with all our spending we do not seem to be able to attract the people in any large numbers to hear the Gospel we preach. There is still something lacking.

As in the North, so in the Midlands, enthusiasm is what we want. This, with a little self-denial, may accomplish a great deal in a combined effort for "the promotion of Christianity in connection with the freedom which rejects subscription to any articles of theological belief," this being the object of the Midland Christian Union. NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The temporary school chapel, which the new congregation at Ashton has erected upon the site in Richmond-street, was opened last Sunday. In the afternoon the preacher was the minister, the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A.; in the evening, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., President of East Cheshire Christian Union. The building, which will hold 350 persons, was overcrowded at both services, and many were unable to gain admission. Collections realised over £33, and several good donations have been received since. At the close of the afternoon service the minister baptised two children, sons of members of the committee, and in each case presented, on behalf of the congregation, a copy of the Revised Version of the Bible. The building has been erected and furnished at the cost of a little over £300. A finely carved reading-desk and chair, a baptismal font, coloured and leaded windows, pictures, carpets, and other useful articles have been presented by various members. Stimulated by an anonymous conditional offer of £50, the congregation will endeavour to clear the cost of the building before Christmas, without drawing upon the Church Building Fund, for which it is appealing to the public. It is hoped that the determined effort to secure adequate buildings for public worship and religious instruction will receive sympathetic assistance.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The anniversary services were held on May 6, when there were large congregations. The preachers were—in the morning the Rev. H. B. Smith, minister; in the afternoon the Rev. D. Davis, minister of the North Shore Church; and in the evening the Rev. W. Binns. An excellent choir had been formed out of the congregation, which rendered special music. Members and friends contributed plants and flowers for the decoration of the hall, and subsequently the cut flowers were distributed to the sick, the aged, and the Victoria Hospital. The collections amounted to £11 8s. 5d. For over six years the South Shore Church existed as a lay-church, and this anniversary completes the first four months of the work under the settlement of the first regular minister. From the report of the Committee, it appears that the year began with the establishment of an envelope offertory system, contribution through which has been made a condition of membership. The result so far has been very gratifying. There has been an accession of new members. A morning service was started on the first Sunday in February, with the result that an encouraging morning congregation is steadily growing. A Ladies' Sewing Society has been begun, numbering twenty-five members working for a sale of work to be held in December. A literature stall has been introduced at the hall doors for the free distribution of Unitarian literature. A good beginning has been made of house-to-house distribution of tracts.

Dover.—The 257th anniversary of the Adrian-street Church was celebrated on Sunday week, the services being conducted by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A.

Halifax: Northgate-end Chapel.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, when the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Hull, preached morning and evening, and the Rev. F. E. Millson gave an account of the Halifax Sunday-school "jubilees" in the afternoon; the scholars and choir sang special hymns and anthems, under the direction of Mr. Wilson, the organist. On Monday evening the Rev. Professor J. Estlin Carpenter gave a most interesting lecture on "Gotama, the Buddha." There were good attendances at the services and lecture, and the collections were £32 10s. 7d. for the school funds.

Liverpool.—The annual meeting of the Domestic Mission Society was held at the Mission-hall, Mill-street, on Tuesday evening, May 8, the President, Mr. Walter Holland, in the chair. The adoption of the report was moved from the chair, and seconded by Mr. R. D. Holt, and a vote of sympathy with the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, and Mr. Anderton was moved by Dr. Klein, and seconded by Mr. Charles W. Jones. Mr. Lloyd Jones being absent on a voyage to India and Australia, Mr. Anderton had included in his report a record of the whole of the work of the Mission. The year had been a prosperous one on the whole for working people, the winter having been exceptionally mild; but there had been a large amount of illness in the district, and the terrible evils due to drunkenness had been constantly pressed upon them. The need of fresh subscriptions to the Mission was shown by a debit balance of £153. A resolution was adopted, on the motion of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, seconded by Mr. W. B. Bowring, in support of the minority report of Lord Peel's Commission, and especially appealing to the House of Commons to pass without amendment the Bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to children under sixteen years of age.

Liscard (Resignation).—The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas has resigned the pulpit of the Memorial Church, and will conclude his ministry at Liscard on the last Sunday in June.

London: Bermondsey.—The retirement of the Rev. H. Rylett from the ministry of the Fort Road Church, which we have already reported, did not take effect without expressions of warm regard and regret on the part of members of the congregation. We understand that teachers are greatly needed for the Sunday-school On Sunday week a flower service is to be held, conducted by the Rev. D. Amos.

London: Peckham.—The Sunday Scholars' Guild of the Avondale-road Church had, on Wednesday, an "Evening with Longfellow." The hymns, songs, and recitations were selected from Longfellow's poems, and the whole was prefaced by a short biographical notice of the poet, presented by Mr. Cecil Griffin. The chair was occupied by the Rev. G. Carter, as Sunday-school superintendent.

London: Stepney.—The usual monthly conference in connection with the Central Postal Mission was held at College Chapel, on Sunday afternoon, May 6, at five o'clock, when a paper was read by Mr. Waddington on "The Salvation Army: its Aims and Methods." An interesting discussion followed the paper, which was full of personal experience. Mr. Tavener occupied the chair and preached in the evening on "Rome: in Paul's day and our own."

London: Stratford.—Special flower services were held last Sunday, being conducted in the morning by Mr. T. Elliot, and in the evening by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B A. In the afternoon Mr. T. Elliot gave a special address to the scholars and teachers of the Sunday-schools. The church looked bright and cheerful, being nicely decorated with spring flowers, and the congregations were good.

Manchester: Bradford.—On Sunday afternoon, following the opening of the new church building, on the previous day, of which a report will be found in another column, the scholars of the Sunday-school assembled at the old hall for the last time, and then marched off to take possession of their new premises. Although the new schoolroom is much larger than the one vacated, it is certain that not many more scholars can be accommodated without discomfort. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. Dendy Agate, who spoke from the words, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and delivered a most impressive discourse on the exercise of religious toleration, and the cultivation of the highest and noblest powers apart from any particular creed, dogma, or form of faith. He thus set forth very clearly the broad principles upon which the church at Bradford is founded.

North-East Lancashire Sunday-school Union.—The second conference of the year was held on May 5, at Newchurch, and proved to be one of the most successful we have held during the last two or three years. An admirable paper was read by Mr. S. Holden, of Burnley, on "The Influence of Sunday-schools on Society." Mr. Holden is an ardent believer in the good work done by Sunday-schools in raising the moral tone of society, and his words were full of hopefulness and inspiration. He holds firm the belief that no good and true work is ever lost, and therefore encouraged teachers to continue their labours even if the fruits were not apparent and visible. Discussion was invited, but resolved itself into a series of expressions of cordial agreement with Mr. Holden. During the evening several musical items were rendered by Mrs. Webster (of Accrington), Miss Nixon, Mr. Lord, and Mr. Hargreaves (of Newchurch), the introduction of music into our meetings having proved a most agreeable innovation. In the course of the meeting the President moved a resolution of welcome to the Rev. E. A. and Mrs. Voysey, who made their first appearance amongst us; this was heartily carried, and Mr. Voysey replied. The usual votes of thanks concluded the meeting.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—The spring conference of the above Association was held in the Central Hall, Darlington, on Monday afternoon; Mrs. John Tweedy, Newcastle, presided. Representatives were present from most of the congregations affiliated to the Association. The meeting having been opened with hymn and prayer, a paper was read by Mr. E. Cox-Walker, of Darlington, on "What is the Matter with our Churches." The discussion was led by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, of Gateshead, and proved most interesting, and doubtless will be valuable. Amongst those who took part were the Revs. John Fox, of Leeds, Charles Travers, of Carlisle, and Mr. Charles Bell, of Redcar (who for close upon fifty years has worked as a lay-preacher). In the evening a public meeting was held in the Unitarian Church, Lead-yard, and was well attended. Mr. W. J. Watson, Town Clerk of Thornaby, and President of the Tees-side Committee, occupied the chair. Interesting speeches were delivered by the Revs. John Fox, Charles Travers, W. H. Lambelle, and Arthur Harvie. Mrs. John Tweedy also addressed the meeting, and urged upon all parents the need of paying greater attention to the religious education of children in the home. The services on the preceding day were conducted by the Rev. John Fox, of Leeds.

Scarborough.—On May 10, at the conclusion of the ordinary monthly committee meeting of the local branch of the R.S.P.C.A., the Rev. F. G. Stapleton, vicar of Seamer, in the chair, a very gratifying presentation was made to the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, who has been for a number of years one of the hon. secretaries of the society. The Chairman said that they desired to mark their sense of the valuable services Mr. Thomas had rendered to the society, both in its general work and in the special duties, under the Dale trust, of visiting elementary schools and examining the essays of the children. The presentation, which was made by Mrs. Steble, included a fine coloured reproduction of Turner's "Fighting Téméraire," a number of Ruskin's works, and a silver afternoon tea service for Mrs. Thomas.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The fourth annual concert of the Guild of Good Endeavour (and Band of Hope) was given in the Channing Hall, on May 8, and resulted in a very successful entertainment, an interesting feature of which was the ceremony of "Crowning the May Queen." The performance was witnessed by an appreciative audience of about 200, and reflects much credit upon the secretary (Mrs. Mince) and the teachers, who assisted her in training the children. Out of the proceeds a sum of 10s. has been sent to the (Unitarian) Indian Famine Fund.

Wolverhampton.—After a lengthy interregnum, caused by the old church on Snow-hill having been sold, a new site purchased in a more favourable situation, and the removal of the iron schoolroom to it, a series of re-opening services commenced on Sunday last, the service being conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, who took as his text, "Freely ye have received, freely give." He said that although some men might say they had earned every shilling they possessed, and are indebted to no man, yet this is altogether a misconception, for everyone is indebted to society and to humanity for all he has, or makes use of, which things have cost those who have gone before him endless thought and toil, and which he freely receives. It is every man's duty, therefore, to give something in return, and not only his money, not only his advice, which many are only too ready to give, but himself. There were about sixty persons present, including a number of strangers. The Rev. Wm. Lindsay, of Christ Church, Nottingham, will conduct the services on the next two Sundays, May 20 and 27. The church is in need of hymn-books, and the Committee would feel grateful to any other church able and willing to let them have surplus copies of Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer" at a reduced price, or as a gift.

Contributions may be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

To the grateful acknowledgements already made to friends in many quarters for generous gifts and other help towards the success of the London Unitarian Bazaar, there is another to be added—and most cordially—to the members of the Brahmo Somaj and other friends in India, who sent very charming and valuable contributions of native workmanship. The bulk of the goods, owing to delay in transit, unfortunately did not reach the King's Hall until the second day of the Bazaar, but as soon as they arrived they found a ready sale and realised a substantial sum.

THE eleventh annual Free Loan Exhibition of Pictures for Southwark and Lambeth will be opened this (Saturday) afternoon at 2.45 by Sir L. Alma-Tadema. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., will take the chair. Mrs. Humphry Ward will also speak. Among the pictures promised are "Joan of Arc," by Sir John Millais, P.R.A. ; "Portrait of the Earl of Iddesleigh," by Edwin Long, R.A. ; "Joan of Arc," by Sir W. Richmond, R.A. ; "Peace and Goodwill," and "Portrait of Lord Roberts," by G. F. Watts, R.A. ; "Bavarian School Children," by Hubert Herkomer, R.A. ; "Portrait of Miss Octavia Hill," by John Sargent, A.R.A. ; &c. Besides the artists above mentioned, pictures are lent by Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, M.P., Sir Cuthbert Quilter, M.P., Hon. W. F. D. Smith, M.P., J. W. Swan, F.R.S. The Countess Feodore Gleichen lends the bust of a child, and Mrs. Woolner a medallion portrait of Lord Tennyson, by the late Thomas Woolner, R.A. The exhibition is to be open until June 17, on weekdays from noon until 10 P.M., and on Sundays from 3 until 10 P.M.

ON Sunday morning the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to preach at Essex Church, this being the first of six successive Sunday mornings on which, as we have already announced, Mr. Brooke is to occupy the pulpit of Essex Church.

THE discussion at the London Diocesan Conference as to the proposed Round-table Conference on the present divisions in the Church was introduced by Prebendary Webb-Peploe, who was followed by Lord Halifax. These representatives to the two chief parties in the Church moved and seconded a resolution, which, after various amendments, was agreed to as follows :—

That this conference request the President to appoint a Round-table Conference, consisting of members of the Church of England, on ritual and the doctrines involved, to name the members, and to fix the terms of reference.

A question asked by the Bishop in his Presidential Address, as to whether representative Nonconformists should be included in the Conference, was met, it is said, by a unanimous negative.

THE CHURCHMEN'S UNION, of which the Rev. W. F. Cobb, D.D., formerly of the E.C.U., is now organising secretary, takes as its motto the well-known words, In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas, and thus states its initial object :—

1. The Churchmen's Union is a society of members of the Church of England who are neither High Churchmen only, nor Low Churchmen only, nor Broad Churchmen only, but Catholics in the sense of endeavouring to combine all that is good and true in each of these three parties.

2. As "Ritualists" have their organisations which give them self-expression and the means of propagating their distinctive principles, and as "Anti-Ritualists" are similarly organised, so the Churchmen's Union is an attempt to organise the great majority of members of the English Church who do not ally themselves with either of these extremes, that so it may be able to speak for all "sober, peaceable, and truly conscientious sons of the Church of England."

3. The Churchmen's Union, therefore, seeks to include in its organisation all those who, by an inexact but well-understood term, are known as "Moderate Churchmen," whether these are found among the historic High Church Party, or the so-called old-fashioned Evangelicals, as well as those who do not identify themselves with either of these two parties.

At a recent meeting of the Union a striking paper on "The Hallowing of Thought by Religion," was read by the Rev. A. Gordon, rector of Middle Clayton, of which the following are the concluding passages :—

It is too bold to think that one can trace the vision of a Church of the future, in which head and heart will each be at liberty, not by the one swallowing up the other, not by the surrender of the peculiar strength of either side—and let me say that I believe we shall never have a dead monotony of talent in this regard ; however we may come to share each other's gifts, there will always be some Christian people whose special function is that of thinking, and other Christian people whose special function is that of experience, practice—call it what you will—no, not by the surrender of the peculiar strength of either side, but by each gladly allowing the fullest scope for whatever the other may have in it to give. A Church in which there will be nothing that can be called mere intellectualism, nothing that can be ridiculed as mere sentimentality, and nothing that can be suspected as mere hasty and ill-considered meddlesomeness — a

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

Church, in short, in which intense religious fervour, and earnest labour for human good will go hand-in-hand with perfect openness of mind and high scientific culture.

This may be only a vision, and far too good to be true; but is it not the experience of the past that the things too good to be true are the truest, and moreover, that it is these things which persist, through all opposition, in turning themselves into realities? This, at least, is certain, that when we can persuade a great multitude to dream any dream or see any vision, we are on the verge of an unwakening to find that that is more than a dream and too substantial for a vision.

Now, to persuade men to look for and desire the better and completer Church that is to be, constitutes, I take it, the work of the Churchmen's Union. In this labour may it have such good success that, even in our own generation, we may see a far fuller realisation than has ever yet been known of what the Apostle set before us when he wrote: "There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit; and there are diversities of ministrations, but the same Lord; and there are diversities of workings, but the same God Who worketh all things in all."

In this month's Seed Sower will be found not only some interesting notes on the National Conference at Leicester, but the speech, which for want of time at the end of the Public Meeting, the Rev. Joseph Wood did not deliver.

THE INDIAN FAMINE.

The following are passages from a letter addressed to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Chairman of the Indian Committee of the B. and F.U.A., and Treasurer of the Famine Fund, by Mr. A. M. Bose, the President of the Brahmo Somaj.

Mr. Bose writes on April 19 from 139, Dhurmtola-street, Calcutta: — "Permit me to offer you and your Committee, and through you to my esteemed friend, Mr. Sunderland, whose appeal initiated this special fund, and above all to our warm-hearted and generous Unitarian friends who have subscribed to it, the expression of our deep gratitude for this fresh mark of sympathy with India in her hour of terrible need. The help will be greatly appreciated, and will, I trust, be the means under Providence of saving some lives and mitigating much suffering in a few corners, at any rate, of the vast tract under the grip of Famine in India; and our generous friends will have the satisfaction of knowing that their kind contributions will be administered by persons moved by the deepest sympathy towards the afflicted multitudes, living and mixing with them, who will make every penny go its farthest in relief of suffering.

"We cheerfully accept the work of being distributors of your relief. I was to have left last week for Darjeeling, where my family have gone; but I have been waiting to set going the arrangements for the work of relief to begin. I placed your letter before a meeting of the Brahmo Somaj Committee, at which the following resolution was most cordially adopted:—

Resolved that the Brahmo Somaj Committee cheerfully accept the offer made to them of administering the funds raised by our Unitarian friends in England for the relief of sufferers from the present famine in India; and in doing so, they wish to record an expression of deep gratitude on their own behalf, and on behalf of the Brahmo community, for this generous contribution in help of the sufferers in India.

"It may interest you to know that we have already placed ourselves in communication with Brahmo friends in Bombay and Punjaub with a view of having arrangements made for immediate commencement of relief work in those parts. Unhappily in the portions of India most affected by the present famine—namely, Central Provinces and Rajputana—there are available hardly any local Brahmo agencies. We have, therefore, arranged to send some earnest Brahmo workers from here to those parts of the country, to carry on the work of relief with such local help as may be available; and I am glad to say we have already got some volunteers, who have offered their services for the purpose."

The following cutting from the Indian Messenger, of April 29, gives further information as to what is being done in this matter:—

"It is a matter for rejoicing that the New Dispensation and Sadharan Samaj workers, have agreed to act together in connection with the administration of the Unitarian Famine Fund. Babus Indubhushan Ray, Lalitmohun Das, M.A., and Sudhir-Chandra Banerjea, from the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, have started for the Central Provinces. They will be soon joined by Bhais Brojogopal Neogi, and Haralal Ray, of the New Dispensation Church. Their first headquarters will be at Khandwa, in the Nimar District, where the suffering is the acutest. Babu Haridas Chatterji, Pleader, Khandwa, who is at present in Calcutta, has kindly offered his Khandwa house as a place of temporary residence for our workers. From Khandwa, they will decide the next centres, where their operations should extend. They may visit Indore and Rajputana, where also the distress is very great."

ANOTHER WHITSUNTIDE MEETING.

Sir,—It is felt by some of us that Whitsuntide will afford to Unitarians attending the anniversary meetings and to other friends in London, an opportunity of protesting against the suppression of free speech in England, and of expressing their desire for a just and peaceful settlement of the war in South Africa, which shall recognise the principle of nationality.

A meeting is therefore being organised at which certain resolutions in favour of these principles will be submitted. The date and place of the meeting will be duly advertised.

In the meantime we shall be glad to hear from any who are in sympathy with the objects named, to whom tickets will be immediately forwarded on application to any of the undersigned:—

G. H. Chancellor, 3, Hornsey Rise-gardens, N.;
Miss Florence Hill, Eirene Cottage, Gainsboro'-gardens, Hampstead, N.W.;
Lawson Dodd, Tunbridge Wells;
Miss Lucy K. Garrett, 12, Highbury-crescent, N.;
Charles Weiss, 14, Well-walk, Hampstead.

Nobleness of character is nothing but steady love of good and steady scorn of evil.—Froude.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

The Study of Comparative Religion.

II.

Light on the Old Testament.

The study of Comparative Religion is interesting from many points of view: in this paper a few notes are offered in illustration of its bearing on the Old Testament. The fortunes of the people of Israel brought them into close contact with a remarkable succession of nations. They came from the Land of the Two Rivers, where an ancient civilisation had existed for thousands of years before the tribes made their way into the land of Canaan. They sojourned in Egypt when the empire of the Nile valley was at the height of its spleudour. The captives of Judah lived beside the Babylonian canals till the successors of Nebuchadrezzar fell before the Persian onset. For the next two centuries the new power controlled the destinies of Jerusalem, till it went down in its turn at the shock of Alexander's conquest, and Western Asia surrendered to the Greek. What light do the discoveries of our century throw on the records of Israel's thought and life in the Old Testament?

It is more than two hundred years since reports and drawings of inscriptions in wedge-shaped (cuneiform) characters at Persepolis and elsewhere first reached Europe. But no progress could be made in deciphering them until more correct copies had been procured. The first effective step was made by Grotefend, of Hanover, in 1802. After long poring over the unknown words he succeeded in identifying three names—Darius, Xerxes, and Hystaspes. The most valuable clue, however, was supplied by a young British officer, Lieutenant Henry Rawlinson, who began in 1835, under great difficulties, to copy a triple inscription on Mount Behistun, near Kermanshah, in Persia. Ten years later, when Consul at Baghdad, he returned to the work, and his results were published in the journal of the Royal Asiatic Society in 1846. It was the most important contribution to cuneiform study.* The inscription was in three languages. The Persian was read with comparative ease, and the key was thus obtained to the others, which were found to be in Median and Babylonio-Assyrian. Meantime Botta had begun to open the mounds at Mosul in 1842, and Layard followed at Nineveh. The latter had discovered part of the Royal library, and the fragments of inscriptions which he collected were estimated by Rawlinson at over twenty thousand. The attention of scholars was at first chiefly drawn to their historical value, but, as new texts were brought to light, it began to dawn upon Sir Henry Rawlinson that some of the early material in Genesis had probably been derived from Babylonian sources. This question was settled in 1872, when the late Mr. George Smith announced his discovery of an epic narrative containing a story which was obviously the prototype of the Noachic flood. From this point the advance has been rapid. Much of the early history of mankind in the first eleven chapters of Genesis can be referred to the general cycle of ideas in Mesopotamia. The story of Eden has not yet indeed been disinterred from the ancient mounds. But here are the roots of the Canaanite culture; here are the origins of obscure mythic forms which (as Gunkel has recently shown) have found an important place in Christian apocalyptic expectation; here are hymn and prayer, the confession of the sinner, and the aspiration of the righteous; here are ideas which a little further development might have lifted nearer to the Hebrew conceptions of the moral government of the world. Here, too, are the temple and the rite, here are hierarchy and sacrifice, and here the figure of the revealing god whose name reappears in Mount Nebo, and is kindred with the "prophet" of Israel. Old Testament language, history, religion, once so fondly deemed unique, are now correlated with products of thought and usage far older than themselves. The cuneiform discoveries have reinforced the conclusions of science that the story of Adam and Eve is in no sense the actual record of an event, and the theologians are left to reconcile as they can their theories of revelation and the positive fact.

What, then, of Egypt, with which the scholars of an older day so often sought to connect some of the details of the institutions attributed to Moses? In that field, too, research has been fruitful, for a whole civilisation has been reconstructed. We can follow the ancient Egyptian now through almost every stage of his career. His toys—even the little wooden crocodiles with snapping jaws—are found in our museums; his dress, his tools, his sports, his occupations, his mathematical problems, his novels, his prayers—we know them all. The temple and the tomb have yielded up their secrets, and the varied panorama of ancient Egyptian life is revealed even more clearly than that of Greece or Rome. A hundred years of incessant labour have had their reward. Discovery began with the famous Rosetta stone during the expedition of Napoleon I. to Egypt in 1799. It contained a decree of the Ptolemaic epoch in two forms of Egyptian writing (hieroglyphic and demotic) and in Greek. The key to the Egyptian was found by an English physician, Dr. Thomas Young, who made out the name Ptolemy, and laid down the leading principles of hieroglyphic decypherment. But his linguistic knowledge was too imperfect to carry him very far, and it was the brilliant French scholar Champollion who began in 1821 the series of publications which securely established the grammar and the lexical affinities of the Egyptian language.

From that time the work of exploration has been busy. Texts were copied,* tentative translations were made, and the strange medley of forms in the Egyptian pantheon slowly emerged into some kind of distinctness. Students were bewildered by the perplexing problems which were offered to them. Mysterious speculations of a quasi-pantheistic type subsisted side by side with degrading types of animal worship. Crude survivals of savagery jostled highly spiritual ideas. At one time it was confidently supposed that the origin of the sublime phrase, "I am that I am" (Exodus iii. 14), might be carried back to an Egyptian formula nuk pu nuk; but the best Egyptologists have long abandoned this identification. Most interest, perhaps, gathered round the remarkable book in which the dwellers by the Nile recorded their faith in the next life, and traced the perils of the soul in its adventurous journey after death through the underworld.

Copies of the "Book of the Dead" are now displayed in all the chief museums of Europe; and almost everyone is familiar with the famous judgment scene in the "Hall of the Two Truths." It was an English scholar, the late Dr. Birch, who first grappled with the difficulties of translating this singular collection of spells and confessions. Here are magic and morals in curious alliance. But no one who has stood in one of the great Egyptian tombs, such as that of Seti I., father of the Rameses of the oppression, and seen the solemn representations of judgment, beatitude, and penal doom, which depicted the destiny of the departed, can help asking himself why such ideas left not a trace on Israel. No student of Hebrew antiquities or religion now resorts to Egypt for an explanation. No one would attempt to connect the morality of the Ten Commandments with the confessions of the soul before the forty-two assessors in front of the sanctuary of Osiris. Some of the sacred hymns of Egypt, long before the Exodus, were far in advance of the tribal customs of the Mosaic age. But Israel had within it the germ of a religious development denied to Egypt, whose ancient faith has little more share in modern religion than is indicated by the curious parallels between Isis and Horus on the one hand and the Virgin and Child on the other,* or the picture of the soul-weighing in the papyrus of Ani and the similar sculpture on the tympanum of the west portal of Notre-Dame in Paris.

While the exiles of Judah were listening to the glowing words of the prophets of the Captivity, a new movement was making itself felt in the North-east. Three years after the fall of Jerusalem (so the latest investigator believes himself able to fix the date), in the year 583, the great reformer Zoroaster passed away at the ripe age of seventy-seven.† His teaching excited the interest of the Greeks, who had already noted in the fourth century before our era its main conceptions of a conflict between good and evil powers, of the final victory of the good, of the abolition of Hades, of a general resurrection and an immortality of happiness in an earth where universal intercourse would be facilitated by the levelling of all the mountains. The scriptures in which these ideas are embodied, known in Western Europe by the name Zend Avesta, have gathered round them the earnest study of a group of modern scholars whose labours have brought to light a series of doctrines of unexpected interest. In 1723 a manuscript was presented to the Bodleian, but the librarian could do nothing better with it than hang it by an iron chain upon the wall. A copy of a few leaves excited the zeal of a young French scholar in Paris, Anquetil Duperron, in 1754. The next year he secured a passage to India by entering himself as a sailor in the service of the French East India Company, and after nine years of adventure he returned laden with precious manuscripts, among which were the sacred books of the Parsees. In 1771 he boldly issued a translation of the Zend Avesta into French. No attempt, however, was yet made to publish the text. More than fifty years passed before the doubts with which Duperron's work had been assailed were finally cleared away by Rask's proof (1826) of the affinity of Zend with Sanskrit. The gifted scholar, Eugène Burnouf, devoted immense labour to the first edition of some of the sacred texts, and founded the philological study of the Avesta. The second half of the century has seen its interpretation securely established, and the main lines of its doctrines clearly expounded. The deep ethical character of Zoroaster's teaching shows a moral intensity which at once wakens the sympathy of the student of the Old Testament; and he is startled at the appearance of ideas which he subsequently meets with in the later doctrines of the Synagogue. Such is the "Good Mind," a kind of Holy Spirit, who is conceived as one of six "Immortal Holy Ones" around the throne of Ahura Mazda, "the Lord all-wise." Such is the angel of "the kingdom," another of the sacred group, concerning which we read "the kingdom is Ahura's," "we praise the good kingdom." To adopt the true religion is "to give the kingdom to Ahura"; and again "he gives the kingdom to Ahura who gives succour to the poor." The details of the great scheme of the last things cannot be expounded here. They include the judgment following death, with its award to the successive heavens of Good Thought, Good Word, Good Deed, and the Home of Song or Endless Light, or to the corresponding hells of Evil Thought, Evil Word, Evil Deed, and Endless Darkness—the final Resurrection and reunion of families beginning the great consummation or "Making the world go forward"—the overthrow of the powers of evil and the bringing back of hell for the enlargement of the world—when the world becomes immortal for ever and ever, and the believers attain to entire fellowship with their heavenly Lord. The doctrine of resurrection makes no definite appearance in the Old Testament till the Book of Daniel in the Maccabean age, where it is connected with the conception of the kingdom given to the saints. Did the Jewish hope of the last things owe anything to the older scheme? The movements of thought are necessarily obscure, and certainty is impossible; but the unquestionable affinities of the doctrine of the Synagogue with Persian ideas suggest the probability that unknown influences were early at work to stimulate the imagination of Israel along the lines of kindred expectation.

The Persian monarchy fell before Alexander's onset, and Asia was opened to Greek influence, which can be traced even in North-west India. Did that influence also affect Israel? Jews were transported in large numbers to Egypt, and Greek immigrants poured into Palestine. They built cities and temples; they introduced new manners; did they also bring any of the conceptions of the schools? No one would have dreamed of asking these questions a hundred years ago. But the study of Greek history, philosophy, religion, has made scarcely less progress during the past century than that which has been effected in less familiar fields;* and the study of the Bible has advanced in the same manner. It is now made probable that Greek influence may be discerned in the development of Wisdom in the Book of Proverbs; it is almost (if not quite) certain that it has shaped some of the phrases in Ecclesiastes. Remoter echoes of Orphic doctrines may perhaps be found in the by-ways of Jewish and early Christian faith about the destiny of the wicked in the next world. Much more important, however, is the transformation of primitive Christianity under Hellenic influence, and the share of Greek thought in enabling the Palestinian teaching to take its place as the dominant factor in the development of European life. The truth is that there are many elements in the Synoptic Gospels which have ceased to speak to the religion of the present day. We turn from the division of time into the "age that now is" and "the age that is to come" with all its elements of catastrophe and divine interference, and we rest in the Hellenic ideals of the world's order which nineteenth-century science has so strenuously enforced. We find that we can learn of Plato as well as of Paul, and we appreciate the large-mindedness of the Alexandrian Clement, when he said that if the Law had been a "tutor" to bring the Jews to Christ, Philosophy had rendered the same service for the Greeks.

QUICUNQUE VULT.

SHOULD I apologise to God
Because, forsooth, I fail to see
You with your little measuring rod
Have rightly gauged infinity?

And must my future hope depend
On God's "uncovenanted grace,"
Because I laugh when you pretend
To wield the Beadleship of space?

Your Heaven is a Concert Hall
With seats reserved for those who buy
The Churches' Tickets: but that all
May enter gratis you deny.

For me, I know the Father's face
Will welcome any who will come;
And none who hunger for His grace
Need other passport to His Home.

For you, your guide-books, tickets, charts,
Indeed may ease a weary way:
But Heaven exists for loving hearts
And none may enter there but they.

Nor does eternal life begin
When death has closed our earthly span;
Nor when our globe shall cease to spin
Through space shall Heaven dawn on man!

Eternal life is theirs who live
Above our finite hopes and fears;
And from eternal thoughts derive
The purpose of their mortal years.

Aye! not your angels stand more near
To God in Heaven than they in whom Faith, Hope, and Love have wakened here,
And solved the terror of the Tomb.

ATHANASIUS AND ARIUS.

SIR,—Is it already an accepted axiom among Unitarians that the teaching of Athanasius was more rational and more spiritual than that of Arius, and that the decision of Christendom in favour of the former has been a great blessing to mankind? If ever these notions should form part of the Unitarian Faith some of us will have to attend the Conferences simply as Non-subscribers. I have so many times heard it stated, or perceived it to be taken for granted, that the views of Athanasius were deep and prescient and abiding, as compared with the temporary crudities of Arius, that I have turned more than once again to the famous orations (English edition) to see whether my own original impression should be modified. I do not find that it is altered in the least degree. The position of Arius, even as stated by his enemy, and especially his Scripture exegesis, seems much more rational than that of Athanasius. The crudities which modern Christians have outgrown belong to the two great rivals in common. Athanasius marks the distinction between the Creator and the created as emphatically as Arius. He scornfully asks: "Is there any likeness between creatures and their Creator?" He declares that if the Son were not truly and properly the Universal Governor, the Great God, the Creator and Maker of all, "he would be, as the Arians imagine, a creature." Human beings are constantly spoken of by Athanasius as creatures in exactly the same sense as the word is used by his adversary; the filial relationship of Man to God, as expounded by spiritual writers of recent times, seems quite foreign to his thoughts. On the other hand, the views of Arius, even as expounded by so unsympathetic a writer as Dr. Harnack, need very little transformation in order to make a perfectly rational creed at the present time. "The Son is an independent existence, essentially separate, distinct, and different from that of the Father; he is neither one and the same Being with the Father, nor of like nature with Him. Otherwise there would be two Gods. Rather, like all reasonable creatures, he has a free will and is capable of change. He was able to be either good or bad; but he determined upon the good, and held to the good without wavering. Accordingly he has by his own will become immutable" ("Dogmengeschichte," Band II., 3te Auflage, S. 195). Arius did well thus to insist on the free will of the Son; he did well to insist that as between the Creator and the creatures the Son was in nature akin to the creatures; that the term "Son of God" did not wholly separate him from his fellows, or justify his being confused with Almighty God. These be even yet good wholesome teachings.

For the rest, whenever, for the sake of argument, Arius takes the notion of generation seriously, the wrath of his adversary knows no bounds, for it places him under the necessity of proving that in his mouth the words begotten, generation, &c., are even more meaningless than in the mouth of Arius. With the latter they are an intelligible metaphor—with the former an inexplicable riddle. Yours for the heretic, J. Ruddle.

THE BIRMINGHAM DISTRICT CIRCULAR.

Sir,—The writer of your Midland Letter of last week refers to a little effort of mine in 1858 in issuing a Unitarian Circular for the Birmingham District. About seven numbers were issued, and in the last I invited others to join in forming a committee to carry the work on. There was no response. Indeed, some of the ministers in those days rather resented my action and did not wish anything of the kind. Only one—the Rev. Edward Parry, now Mayor of Kidderminster—gave me any effective support and encouragement. My object now is to say that I still adhere to the sentiments in the paragraph quoted by your correspondent, and have steadily worked under their influence, and, I think, with good results. Times are altered now. The National Conference, Sunday School Unions, the Sunday School Session, and local associations have put a different aspect on denominational life, and our young people know they belong to a church of which they may well be proud. At the same time, I do not think we are making as good a use of the Press as we might. Our newspapers are cheap enough, but few in our congregations take them in. Our local magazine, The Seed Sower, edited by the Rev. Joseph Wood, we have found very useful. We make our people have it; we send a free copy to every house connected with our chapel and school, and we insure its being read by pasting in a page of scraps relating to our own doings, which is eagerly looked for. A collection is made every year for the cost, and if enough is not raised the balance is provided out of the chapel offertory. We circulate Young Days in the same way, sending a copy to every house where there are young children. The Sunday-school pays for these. Having agents to sell periodicals always failed. The trouble is too great, and a loss to the agent almost certain. The Christian Freeman we have well supported for forty-four years, but we do not now circulate them monthly. We accumulate, then bind them up, two years in a volume, and use them in the Sunday-school. Henry McKean.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

Sir,—May I be allowed to draw the attention of your readers to the announcement of our annual meeting which contains a new feature. After the formal business is concluded, we propose to hold a short conference on "Women's Work in Christian Churches." We shall have the privilege of hearing Mrs. Brooke Herford and the Rev. Marion Murdock; their wide experience both in England and the United States will add much to the interest of the conference.

There are so many aspects to this question, there is so much quiet work being done by women within our denomination under great difficulties, and such large and varied work being carried on by the orthodox, from whose methods we have much to learn, that we hope that any one who can throw fresh light on some special point, or who can speak from personal experience, will take part in the conference, so that it may be of real practical value.

Florence Hill,

Hon. Sec., Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union.

GIFT OF HYMN-BOOKS.

Sir,—A member of my congregation has about twenty copies of "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home," and sixteen chant-books, all in good condition, and some quite new. I shall be glad to hear from any one who can make good use of them. They will be presented gratis to the most suitable applicant on paying carriage. B. C. Constable.

OUR MOORLAND HOME.

The imagination of many readers of The Inquirer must have been touched from time to time last year by the reports which appeared of the grand doings at our Moorland Home. The simple ingenious exclamations of children released from dull city schools, and of elder scholars escaped from mill and factory, must have found an echo in the hearts of all who love the country and who wish to see its humanising touch laid upon the lives of our young people too much now divorced from it. Last year about 300 scholars and teachers enjoyed a full week's holiday in the bracing air of the High Peak of Derbyshire, where our Home is situated. For six full weeks successive relays of our children livened up our Moorland village of Great Hucklow with their song and laughter, and for many more weeks and months the delights of our Moorland Home have lived in the children's hearts, a glorious memory of the past and an alluring hope of the future. So successful was last year's experiment that the Manchester District Sunday School Association, which is carrying on the work, decided to put it upon a permanent basis and to extend its advantages to a still larger number of schools. To this end it leased a large field, upon which it proposed to erect a suite of corrugated iron buildings, embracing sleeping and entertaining rooms for a party of from eighty to 100. Unfortunately, however, prices are ruling very high just now, but we have been able to modify our plans in such a way as to secure nearly all the advantages originally contemplated at an expenditure of about £500 only. We are erecting a large day room, 50 ft. by 23 ft., in which all meals will be served, entertainments given in the evenings and on wet days, &c., and we are also putting up kitchen, larder, &c. Then we have taken three good cottages on a three years' lease, and had them transformed into excellent dormitories for boys, while for the girls we have hired the Old Hall again. Thus we secure our accommodation for eighty each week with a separate bed for each child. Here at a trifle over six shillings a week we shall provide board and lodging for scholars up to sixteen years of age, and for elder ones and teachers for a slightly higher price. Already some twelve or thirteen school parties, ranging from single classes up to the entire accommodation of the Home, have been booked for the coming season, and we have little doubt that the places still vacant will soon be applied for. When the scheme is in full working order, we hope to entertain at least 1,000 scholars and teachers each year.

Beside the great pleasure which our Holiday Home affords, it is teaching us how to enjoy a simple quiet holiday—a lesson badly needed up here in the North. In the past holidays, with many of us, have only been a change of one form of rush and excitement for another, the noise and clatter of the mill giving place to the din of Douglass or Blackpool. The calm and quiet of Great Hucklow have been a revelation to many of what a holiday should be, and thus they have learned how to secure infinitely better moral and physical results at a tithe of the old expense. And then the movement is helping us in our school-life. From every school there comes the same testimony. Teachers and scholars who have visited Hucklow are knit together in deeper confidenceand affection than ever before. Thus from every point of view this movement is one which is sure to appeal to all readers of The Inquirer. It is, I believe, absolutely unique in the history of Sunday-school work in this country. Never before, apart from the experiments out of which it has come, has the attempt been made to transfer the whole school, scholars, teachers, and minister, and to establish it in a country home, just one big happy family, for a whole week together. No words are needed to emphasise the priceless value which this opportunity gives to the earnest teacher to influence the lives of his scholars.

And now if I have in any measure enlisted the sympathy of my readers, may I venture to disclose my design, which is to secure their help? Our funds will only suffice to provide bare necessities; there is no balance for luxuries. And there are a few luxuries we want badly. We want a piano to lead the singing of our morning hymn, and to banish melancholy on wet days. A second hand cottage piano will do, and we will gladly pay carriage on it. Has any reader such an instrument to spare? Or, of course, we could ourselves purchase one if a few of those of our friends who have no pianos to give away would kindly send me small subscriptions for that special purpose. Then we want a few carpets to cover the stone floors of our cottages, and a few curtains for the windows. Should any friends have any about which they are in doubt during their spring cleaning, will they settle the matter by sending them to me? It is for the sake of the children that I make this appeal, and I know I can plead no more effective claim to the sympathy of my readers. Will those who can help us kindly address their communications to me at 15, Lincoln-grove, Chorlton-on-Medlock, Manchester.

ICELANDIC SAGAS.*

The occasional visits to this country of cultured Icelanders have excited in those who have had the privilege of their acquaintance considerable interest in that distant island and its ancient traditions and literature. Some of our readers will remember the Icelandic poet and preacher Mr. Jochumsen, who was introduced to them by our late friend Mr. Spears, and preached in more than one of our chapels. Another learned Icelander, Mr. Magnussen, has become a permanent resident, as sub-librarian of the University of Cambridge. Dr. Stefánsson, who is now on an extended visit to this country, and is engaged in literary studies, has issued this beautifully illustrated work in collaboration with Mr. W. G. Collingwood, well known as author of the "Life and Work of Ruskin." Acknowledging with more or less shame an almost entire ignorance of the subject, the present reviewer can say little more than that he has read the book with much interest; that the legends and Sagas throw light on the early history of Scandinavian literature; that the numerous illustrations, especially those in colours, are beautifully executed and show that much of the scenery is very attractive; and that the book must be indispensable to the English student of Icelandic legends. If we may venture a word of criticism, we could have wished that some account of the present life and condition of the people had been included. But this was not a part of the purpose of the authors, and it is to be hoped that Dr. Stefánsson, who has special qualifications for such a work, may yet supply what we cannot but think is a desideratum, as we believe there is no complete modern history of Iceland in the English language. Having said this much, we fall back upon the Preface, and quote a couple of paragraphs which give a clear account of the nature and object of the book:—

This is a picture-book to illustrate the Sagas of Iceland. It is intended to supply the background of scenery which the ancient dramatic style takes for granted. The old Saga-tellers' audience knew the country, and needed no landscape description, except here and there a word to fix the weather or time of year; or in some romantic adventures, like those of Grettir, to conjure up the mysterious giant's dale, or the demons' awful chasms. And so the modern reader, out of Iceland, is wholly at a loss when he tries to stage these dramas, to visualise the action and events. Their human interest and artistic power he acknowledges, but when he tries to imagine the surroundings of the figures all is blank; and he has little help from travellers' tales of pony-riding and picnic-making at the Geysir, or Hecla, or the Sulphur mines, none of which are so much as named in the stories of old. If he fancies Grennar's "blake acres," and Snorri's Holy Fell, the spots where Gudrún dwelt and Kjartan died, as a howling wilderness of frost and fire, how impossible the whole thing becomes. Tenderness and passion of a sort may be found wherever human life can be lived; but the intense tenderness and the intense passion of the Sagas could only be developed among scenery, which, whether the actors felt it or not, reacted upon their sentiment.

It was in this belief that the two friends undertook their pilgrimage. Mr. Collingwood apparently is responsible for the illustrations. Dr. Stefánsson, who as a well-known Icelander had peculiar advantages for such a tour, made notes, identified sites and described remains. The result is a very handsome book that is not only ornamental, but useful to every serious student of a country abounding in natural wonders and rich in legendary lore. T. L. M.

OBITUARY.

MRS. ARTHUR LUPTON.

The death, on May 10, of Mrs. Arthur Lupton, of Headingley, near Leeds, at the age of seventy-one, has already been briefly announced in these columns. She was the widow of the late Mr. Arthur Lupton, who died eleven years ago—a man long to be remembered for his active public philanthropy, his general high-mindedness, and his strong personal influence over others.

The lady, whose death is here referred to, was Mr. Lupton's second wife, and was married to him on April 25, 1866. Unlike her husband in one thing—for schemes of organised benevolence appealed to her less warmly—she was yet like him in another, insomuch as her heart went forth always to the sufferer, be he who he might, and her acts of personal kindness were neither few nor stinted, if the world knew little of them. A certain occasional touch of asperity on the surface, which may have deceived some people in her, with others only served to emphasise the true largeness of heart and depth of sympathy and the solid substratum of good sense which lay beneath. Her intellect was of no ordinary type, she watched with keen interest all that was going on in the larger world outside as well as in her own immediate sphere, she was a bright and entertaining talker, and her strong sense of humour and natural histrionic powers illuminated her conversation generally. In her the art—supposed to be dying out—of writing a vivid, graphic, and humorous letter certainly still survived. Her influence (always for good) was of a kind to be felt rather than defined, for she unconsciously raised the tone of any society she entered, and no unworthy thought or motive could long be harboured in her presence. She was possessed, besides, of a profound insight into some of the deeper problems of life and character, as those who were privileged with her intimacy well knew. And thus on many grounds the loss of her social influence will long be felt.

Mrs. Lupton was a daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Crawford, formerly minister of Call-lane Chapel, Leeds, and granddaughter of the late Rev. William Wood, F.L.S., minister of Mill-hill Chapel in the same city, who added to his qualifications for the ministry the distinction of being an able botanist. Her uncle was the late Mr. George William Wood, M.P. for South Lancashire, a man well known to Macaulay and others of equal celebrity in his day. With Mrs. Lupton, therefore, has passed away another link with a deeply interesting past, whilst her rare personality and gifts of character will be long remembered by those who knew her.

In the absence of the Rev. Charles Hargrove, the funeral service at Lawnswood Cemetery on May 15, was conducted by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, an old and steadfast friend of the family, the selected hymns being admirably rendered by members of the Mill-hill choir.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Drummond's Hibbert Lectures.

As the Evangelist meditated on these things, he saw that the Word had become flesh. This was to him no idle and speculative dream, but a reality of experience; for the image of the Beloved had sunk into his heart, and changed his inmost being; and, as he gazed, the whole aspect of life, of truth, of duty, was transfigured. The Thought of God, his Thought or Word to mankind, had been graven in a human image, and had spoken in the pathetic and awful tones of a human life and death. But in proceeding to this further conception he did not deny any truth that had been already reached. For him, too, the creation bore the impress of Divine Thought, and without that thought no single thing had been made. He does not dwell on this, for he is hastening to another theme; but how much is conveyed in the few words which he employs! Not only the mysterious pomp of heaven, marching with undeviating regularity from age to age, but each minutest flower, each insect that flitted its happy moment in the sunshine, was an expression of Divine power, and sprang into being in accordance with the laws of Eternal Reason. His spiritual ear caught a Divine melody as the waves of the Ægean broke at his feet, and heard amid the silence of the night the far-off music of the spheres; and when, leaving details, he saw all things united into one stupendous plan, he beheld, as in the speaking face of a statue, the cosmic Thought of the infinite Artist visibly portrayed. Yet this was not the Word of God which man most deeply craved. All was order and beauty without; but what of the disorder and vileness within? What of holiness and pity and love? How was their inner meaning to be revealed? How were God's tenderness and sympathy and forgiveness to be shed over the world, and made a living reality to the hearts of men? They could not be enshrined in mere material bulk; they could not gleam from the stony eyes of a mountain, or plead with us in the tempest's shriek. The heavens declare the glory of God, but to find his higher spiritual attributes you must see them in the expression of a holy face or the conduct of a devoted life. The Word made flesh, the Divine Thought for humanity making its tabernacle in the form of a Son of Man, satisfies our religious need as Nature by itself can never do. In seeing Nature we see the Creator, the unapproachable, many will say the unknowable, Cause; but in seeing Christ we see the Father, and "it sufficeth us," and our hearts are at rest.

To those (they are still too few) to whose faith the Word has been made flesh, the chill rigidity of dogma and precept breaks into the warm movements of a living spirit. Unfettered by superstitious fears, they welcome the advance of knowledge, feeling assured that no science can ever turn to ugliness the divine beauty of holiness and love, or disprove what the Spirit says to the surrendered and faithful soul. The fragmentary records of Christ's life have little to satisfy an idle curiosity, and their artless and popular style and varying accounts invite the criticism of the learned; but all the more brightly do they reveal what we want to know, the character of a soul, and we receive from their perusal a distinct impression of a wonderful and exalted personality, which becomes ever after the haunting ideal of our lives. But this ideal can display itself through an endless variety of forms both of intellect and action, and instead of restraining any of our natural gifts, it pervades them all as with a breath of holy energy, and consecrates them to unselfish ends. Here, then, we rest: not primarily in the Church, nor in the letter of Scripture, but in the lowly Son of Man have we seen the Word of God, full of grace and truth; and hiding this Divine Thought in our hearts, we would make it the secret force of our activity, and, whatever may be our pursuits, rise into fellowship with Christ in the reverent worship of God and the loving service of mankind.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Legend of St. Christopher.

The old story or legend of St. Christopher Dean Stanley once spoke of in Westminster Abbey as a kind of Sunday fairy tale. It is a fairy tale, with a good homely lesson in it, and one does not tire of telling it over and over again. It belongs to the early times of the Christian Church, when people easily believed that the most wonderful and impossible things really happened. But that cannot spoil the beautiful truth at the heart of the story.

This man, afterwards called Christopher, was at first, so the story runs, a heathen giant. But though he towered head and shoulders above all ordinary people and was of prodigious strength, he was not made to be a leader of men. He knew, I suppose, that he was not fit for that. What he wanted was to find some great king—indeed, the greatest king of all, whom he might follow and be his servant.

And first he came to the court of a very famous king, with wide dominions and great armies, whom all the people spoke of as "the great king." Dazzled by the splendour of his court, the giant entered his service, and for some time was content; but one day he discovered that at the name of Satan, uttered in a minstrel's song, the king and his courtiers shuddered and crossed themselves. He did not know who Satan might be, but evidently there was some one of whom this king was afraid, and the giant would not stay with him. He was warned that to become a follower of Satan meant destruction, and that it was an evil service; but all the giant cared for was to find the greatest and strongest king, and he would not attend to what the people said. So he went again upon his search, and, having found Satan, after very short delay, blindly offered himself, and rode in the train of the Prince of Darkness.

But then again he quickly learnt that this was not the greatest king of all. For coming one day to a place where two roads met, the sign pointing the different ways was in the form of a cross, and when they saw it Satan and his whole troop swerved suddenly aside and rode hastily away. When the giant asked what it meant, they told him the cross was the sign of the power of Jesus Christ, against whom they were in rebellion, and they dared not face him, because he was stronger than they.

So once more the giant was left alone, and set out to find this Jesus Christ, who, it seemed, was strongest of all. For a long time he searched in vain, with no one who could tell him where Christ was to be found. But one day, in a lonely forest, he came upon an old man, living there a solitary life of contemplation, who, when he heard the giant's story, and understood what manner of man he was, offered to show him the way. "But," he said, "it is difficult, and not such as the world likes to go along. It requires that you should be very patient and faithful, and should do without questioning, what is asked of you." And this the giant promised.

There was not far off a deep river with a dangerous ford, where many travellers had to cross, and where there were often accidents and people lost their lives. There the old man told him to build a hut and live by the ford so that he might always be ready to help those who came down to cross the river. And this he did patiently and faithfully for a long time. He had promised to obey, and though often he wondered how in this way he was to find Christ, yet he kept his promise, and many people owed to him their lives, because of the help he gave them with his great strength at the dangerous ford.

Then it happened one dark and stormy night, when the floods were high and the passage of the river deeper and more dangerous than ever, that soon after he had lain down to sleep, he heard a voice crying close at hand, and when it was repeated he went out and found a little child standing by the rushing waters, and begging to be carried over.

The giant knew no fear, and at once took the child upon his shoulders, and supported by his staff, which was the stem of a palm-tree he had rooted up, entered the torrent. But as he went into the darkness the waters rose about him, and the wind came sweeping down with terrific force, and the child upon his shoulders grew heavier and heavier, till it seemed to him as though he were crushed down under the weight of the whole earth. And only with terrible effort, setting his whole strength steadfastly against the rushing torrent, did he succeed in reaching the opposite shore and setting down the child in safety. Then there was a great calm. The wind ceased, and the moon broke through the troubled clouds, and lighted up the place where they were standing. Only the river still rushed by, but now it made no noise.

The giant knew, already, that it could be no ordinary child he had so carried across the stream, and wondering, he looked into its face, and said: "Child, who art thou? for it seemed to me as though I carried the whole world upon my back." Then the child answered: "Christopher" (and it was the first time that name had been spoken), "Christopher, it is no wonder; for, indeed, you have carried him who is Lord of the earth and of the heavens. I have seen your faithfulness, and your humble patience, when you have helped those who were in need. And it has been a prayer to me, which I have answered. For I have come to you, and give you this name Christopher, because you have borne the Christ, and as a token that you are my faithful servant. And now plant your staff into the ground, and it also shall be a sign." Then as he obeyed, the staff once more took root and put forth leaves, and became a living tree, which bore fruit in its season. And ever after Christopher knew the Lord, and understood that the true service of a Christian was in humility and patience, and brotherly kindness to those in need of help. And he saw also that he, who is Lord over all, greater and stronger than any other, yet works by gentle ways, and is himself unseen, whose law of holiness and love is in the heart of man.

So runs the legend, which is devoutly told in the old chronicles, with much admiration for its marvels, and which you may see in pictures and sculptures in the churches of many lands, to keep the people in mind of its great lesson of discipleship. That lesson will become more real and beautiful to us, if we remember that he, who in the legend, as in the old theology, is spoken of as Lord of heaven and earth, was in fact himself meek and lowly of heart, and came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He it was who, before all others, by his own example of helpfulness and self-renouncing love, taught men how most perfectly to do the Father's will, and so to find the true way of life.

AN OLD CHURCHYARD IN THE MIDST OF A CITY.

I.

A peaceful spirit seems to haunt the place,
As if the solemn angel of the dead
Brooded above, and from its pinions shed
Deep quietude; as if the soothing grace
That dwells in distant woodlands and the space
Of tranquil fields descended here, and, wed
With the faint murmur of the city, bred
A calm which holds the soul in its embrace.
It is a verdant isle, and round it raves
And roars the full tide of humanity
In swelling, onward-sweeping, conquering waves
That flow towards the nation's liberty;
But here sits silence by the grass-grown graves,
Dreaming of what has been and what may be.

II.

We travel o'er a waste of waters wide,
And need there is for some secluded nest
Within our life, where we may pause and rest
From struggling onward with the rushing tide,
Some green God's-acre where sweet flowers abide
And wild birds sing. If but the troubled breast
Have such a bower of peace, it shall be blest
With secret strength in richest store supplied.
Then from the raging anguish of the heart,
The care and strife of this tempestuous sea,
We may withdraw and muse awhile apart
On all things pure and lovely, silently.
So shall we find our pilot and our chart;
From the great Past evolve the great To Be.

UNITY OF SPIRITUAL LIFE.

THE essay on "Unitarian and Trinitarian" by the Vicar of Yardley Wood, which appeared in the last two numbers of THE INQUIRER, contains much that is attractive and stimulating to reverent thought. In what light such a "Theological Eirenicon" may be regarded by other members of the Church of England we have as yet had no opportunity of judging, except that considerable extracts from the first part of this essay appeared in last week's Church of England Pulpit, together with a friendly editorial note, which says that "the Unitarian's strength is in his strong grasp of the Immanence of GOD, a conception which is as old as religious thinking, but has attained a new and deeper life to-day," and concludes that the Unitarian and the Trinitarian views "are not contradictory but complementary, and should be capable of being welded into a deeper truth." For our own part, we have given the most respectful attention to Mr. BEEBY'S essay, and not least to those passages in which he points out what he regards as the defects of Unitarians as a body. It will be best, perhaps, in the first instance, to add a note or two on those passages.

Mr. BEEBY speaks of the serious loss Unitarians have suffered from having "cut themselves off from the tradition of the larger Christian Church," and having "become isolated as a denomination." But that has been no wilful act of theirs, and no willing separation from the larger communion of Christendom. It is the "larger Christian Church" that has shut out the heretics, not permitting within its borders any worship consistent with what to the heretics was essential truth. It was only after Parliament had definitely refused to tolerate the desired latitude and to permit a larger comprehensiveness in the Church of England, that THEOPHILUS LINDSEY in 1773 resigned his living at Catterick, and went up to London to gather a congregation of avowed Unitarians; while at the same time the Unitarianism which was growing up in the atmosphere of freedom in some of the old English Nonconformist congregations was only forced into an attitude of opposition and separateness by the pointed hostility of those who still held to the creed of their Puritan forefathers.

The charge that Unitarians "separate themselves from popular religious movements (except that of education) because of the shock which these give their cultured taste," we cannot think to be well founded. Unitarians have been devoted workers not only in the cause of education, which we might wish were a much more popular "religious movement" than it is, many of them have been no less devoted to the cause of temperance and of social reform, but not with such complete co-operation with others as they would wish, simply because the strong evangelical tone of many of the organisations devoted to such ends shut them out from fellowship. It was not the Unitarians' "cultured taste" which kept them from forgetting theological differences in common efforts of moral and social reform, but the watchfulness of the guardians of orthodoxy.

Whether Unitarians as such are "deficient in spirituality, except of the cold intellectual order," as we are told the world is apt to think, we must leave the critics of CHANNING and MARTINEAU and STOPFORD BROOKE to discuss; but if any Unitarian, as may very likely be the case, is inclined to object, he may find some satisfaction in Mr. BEEBY'S distinction between those who are the "real Unitarians" and those who are "real Trinitarians." But the vital point, after all, is, who most truly enters into the meaning of the divine Fatherhood, in all its depths and intensity, for that is the essential Gospel. The doctrine of the Trinity, in Mr. BEEBY'S view, has best preserved that truth; but when we ask what the Fatherhood really is in the doctrine of the Trinity, we find that what is prized as of supreme worth is the identification of GOD with our humanity, what we may call the Humanity of GOD. The dogma of the Church that CHRIST is GOD, has, according to Mr. BEEBY, preserved "for re-issue in our own day," the essential truth that "GOD is CHRIST," which we take to mean that the compassion and sympathy of the humanity of CHRIST reveal to us the very heart of GOD. But the "re-issue" of this truth, needed in our own age, surely cannot be in the old mintage of the doctrine of the Trinity. "Unitarianism exists," says Mr. BEEBY, "to uphold the doctrine of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, as one GOD"; and just before he said: "If the Unitarian understand by Fatherhood all that ATHANASIUS meant by Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, he has gained the truth which the mere professor of the Trinitarian formula may readily miss." We will not answer for ATHANASIUS, but so far as we understand the exposition of the meaning of Father, Son, and Spirit, by such theologians as Mr. BEEBY, Dr. RASHDALL, and Canon WILBERFORCE, it is clear to us that all the essential spiritual truth which they maintain to be expressed in the doctrine of the Trinity, is rightly centred in the one and undivided truth of GOD as Father, the Eternal, the Ever-present, in whom all living souls, from JESUS, the Chief of faithful souls, to the little children of to-day, have their true life and their abiding home.

The Idealist interpreters of the Trinity and the Unitarians of kindred spirit may not come at once to see eye to eye in this matter, but we are grateful to Mr. BEEBY for his essay and for the open way of sympathy and mutual understanding into which he has invited us to enter.

A JUBILEE WITH A FORWARD LOOK.

THE fiftieth annual meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, held at Essex Hall on Thursday evening, of which we are obliged to hold over our report until next week, naturally invited retrospect, but only that yet stronger emphasis might be laid upon present enlarging opportunies and the greater responsibilities of the future. It is eminently satisfactory to be assured that as a result of generous donations of friends not only in London, but in different parts of the country, reinforced by the great success of the recent bazaar, the Society has more than attained the £12,000 which was aimed at as a Jubilee Memorial Fund for the strengthening of its work in the metropolis. Thus fresh stimulus will be given to the work of existing churches, several of them being lifted over somewhat awkward and unnecessary difficulties, while the Permanent Building Fund will be available for the maturing of fresh efforts for which the constant extension of the vast community of London makes such urgent appeals.

The first general meeting of the Society, held at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars, on Thursday, May 2, 1850, was duly reported in these columns. Alderman LAWRENCE was appointed the first President, and the vice-presidents were the Revs. Dr. HUTTON, E. TAGART, T. MADGE, J. BOUCHER and Dr. HARRISON, Messrs. RICHARD TAYLER, J. GRIFFIN and W. STEVENS. Mr. RICHARD CHAMBERLAIN was treasurer, and Messrs. J. E. CLENNELL and J. C. LAWRENCE hon. secretaries. Among other well-known names of those present at the inaugural meeting are those of TAYLER, PRESTON, NETTLEFOLD, CLARKE and PLIMPTON. It was ten years later that the Rev. ROBERT SPEARS became connected with the Society, to which he rendered such distinguished services.

Of the need of such a society, to unite the Unitarians of the metropolis in closer sympathy and in fresh efforts of common work, there was at the time of its foundation abundant evidence. In a letter addressed to THE INQUIRER on May 18, 1850, referring to the new Society, the late Dr. SADLER said:—

I write what I know to be the fact, when I state that many a young man who has been convinced by our logic, has felt lonely after he has joined our regular services, from not having brethren to work and sympathise with, from finding his church membership adequate to only one portion of his religious wants; and the result is, that while some stay listlessly with us, others content themselves with less pure doctrine elsewhere, and a third-class wander over London after pulpit excitements.

And the original Committee in their appeal for support thus described the aims of the Society:—

The Committee feel that Unitarian Christianity is no cold system of technical theology, but a living principle, filling the soul with warm emotions, and affording scope for the highest aspirations and the noblest efforts. But to preserve its influence on the soul requires the sympathy of kindred minds, and they look forward to the time when all who hold the faith once "delivered to the saints," shall become deeply impressed with the responsibility imposed upon them, and unite their efforts for the extension of God's kingdom on earth. To bring together all the Unitarians of the metropolis, to strengthen their faith by mutual aid and sympathy, to encourage every one to labour in some Christian work, and by extending the knowledge of primitive Christianity to remove some of the difficulties which deter the timid and discourage all—such are the aims of the London District Unitarian Society.

After fifty years of patient effort, with varying success, but unabated faith, a new impulse is given to the Society, and its members must thankfully look forward into the new century, with the determination not to fall short of the faith, and far to outstrip the achievements of the past. In a leading article in these columns on the foundation of the Society it was said: "What is wanted now is, not the reproduction of former polemics, but such an exhibition of the positive truths of Christianity as will bring the genuine faith of CHRIST to bear upon the hearts and consciencies of men." No better watch-word could be taken into the coming years. We who are Unitarians shall bear the most effective witness to the truth which has possessed our lives not by skilful controversy, however unavoidable and useful that may be at times, but by forgetting ourselves in devoted religious work. We have to show the power of our faith to uplift human lives, to strengthen for righteousness, to save from sin, to bring back the pure joy of life, to lead men to GOD; that is done through self-forgetting love and demonstration of the Spirit. Where it is done, the truth of doctrine will emerge, as natural to such religious life. To gather the lonely into brotherly fellowship, to feed souls hungering for righteousness and for sympathy, to open ways for free spiritual worship, these are great aims, which should command devoted service, and a loyal enthusiasm far greater and better than any polemic spirit. So determined, the London District Society will find that its new opportunities have not come in vain.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE sixty-fifth annual meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday evening in the schoolroom of Unity Church, Islington, the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., in the chair.

After an opening hymn, and prayer by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, the Chairman called upon Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE, as treasurer, to present the accounts. In doing so, Mr. Roscoe said that for the past two years they had been living in a state of artificial prosperity, owing to the fact that legacies received had been spent as income, and they had begun the year with a balance of £205 2s. 9d. in hand. But the regular income from subscriptions had fallen off, and legacies had not been received sufficient to make good the deficiency, so that the year closed with an adverse balance of £30 14s. 2d. If the subscription list was not increased, they could for a few years continue their work uncrippled by selling out Consols, but that would be a very undesirable course, and he appealed for an assured additional income of £300.

The Rev. Dr. G. DAWES HICKS, as secretary, then read the Committee's report:—

The report, having gratefully acknowledged the earnest and faithful labours of the missionaries, and appealed especially for additional personal help at Bell-street, noted with satisfaction the value of the Conference of Domestic Mission Workers held in Liverpool last year, and recorded the gift of £300 from the Holly-hill Guild, made in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Holly-hill School, to secure a country cottage to be used as a convalescent home by the Bell-street Mission. It was expected that a small house at Seaford, overlooking the downs and the sea, would be shortly rented for that purpose, and would be of great service to the Convalescent work, but the need of subscriptions for maintenance would continue.

Interesting particulars as to the work at Rhyl-street, George's-row, and Bell-street were given, and referring to the unsatisfactory state of the finances, reference was made to the small number of congregations holding collections in support of the work.

The loss of old subscribers was regretfully recorded, among them being Miss Agnes Bartram, Mrs. Bowring, Mr. Stephen Busk, Mrs. Colfox, Mrs. T. Smith Osler, Miss Swanwick, Mrs. Weiss, Mr. Thomas Young, and Dr. Martineau. Having spoken of his life-long interest in the work of Domestic Missions, and his frequent advocacy of them, as embodying the universal and perpetual spirit of Christianity, the report concluded:—

Fifteen years ago Dr. Martineau presided at the annual meeting, and delivered a speech in which he dealt at length with the circumstances that led to the establishment of the Society, and with its subsequent history. In once more soliciting for the work under their charge the generous support of friends and subscribers in London and the country generally, your Committee feel they cannot more fittingly summarise its object and aim than in the words Dr. Martineau himself used in the address referred to. "It is," he said, "the fundamental assumption of this Society that at least a vast proportion of the evils which, especially in large towns, are a blot upon our civilisation, have their root in moral causes, and admit of being arrested or reduced by personal reformation of habit through elevation of character and enlargement of thought and sympathy. It therefore proposes to deal with the flock under its charge, one by one; and to place over it true representatives of 'the Good Shepherd,' who 'knows his sheep, and is known of them.' And all its modes of action—the school, the library, the lecture-room, the temperance society, the chapel—are instruments for the influence of mind on mind, the higher on the lower. It addresses itself to the springs of character; and, refusing to treat men as the helpless victims of circumstance, develops the intelligence, appeals against their passions to their unselfish affections, their self-respect, their sense of duty, their loyalty to the Eternal Righteousness. This it does in the faith that living moral energy, summoned to the front, can deal marvellously with a mass of external difficulty; while, without it, you will vainly lift off the dead weight of physical obstruction, and offer a clear stage to the unawakened soul. This reliance on a message to the Conscience and a gospel of the Spirit has never made you or your missionaries indifferent to the resistance which their work encounters from the outward lot of the poor in our large towns. Their reports are a continuous magazine of evidence, exposing the fearful crowding and insanitary state of the courts and slums of our great human hives. But while protesting against these hindrances, the true missionary resolutely presses on, and finds the better possibilities of humanity accessible to him still."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and the accounts, expressed his happiness in being able once more to take part in a meeting of that Mission, and his confidence that the work would not be suffered to be curtailed for want of necessary support. The continuous increase of that great city, and the consequent increasing needs of the people among whom they laboured, appealed to them rather to extend than to curtail their work. Speaking of the unusual number of old friends lost during the past year, and particularly of Dr. Martineau, he said that some of them would recall the great speech he made in 1885 at the jubilee of their Society, but it was not so generally known that Dr. Martineau's connection with the Society had nearly begun at its foundation when he was invited by the Rev. W. J. Fox to become its first Domestic Missionary. It was remarkable to think what direction might have been given to his activity and what influences might have flowed through their Society had he even for a short time taken service in its ranks. His heart was always with them, and in those words quoted in the report he laid down the essential characteristics of their work. Some might phrase it differently, but it was the happy characteristic of their Society, as would be gathered from the varied reports of the missionaries, that every one found scope for their energies, and each centre of work had its own character, communicated by the energies and specific genius of its leader and by the fellow-workers gathered round.

They were faced by the ever-recurring problem of reconciling the outward circumstances with the needs of the inner spirit, and of producing character that could boldly front conditions so much more depressing than many of them could realise, under which life had to be lived. Mr. Summers and Mr. Gray both dwelt in their reports on the continuously depressing effect of the permanent conditions of life among the London poor, and they could not wonder at the plea made by missionary after missionary that much larger measures than any yet attempted should be undertaken for the re-housing of the poor. Would it not be possible in the buildings happily now being erected and becoming more numerous, to have something corresponding to that common drawing-room which Miss Octavia Hill had established in more than one of her courts in Marylebone? A large, pleasant room, well furnished and lighted, to hold from fifty to 100 people, was opened night after night, and was the common drawing-room of the people of the court. So in Glasgow the present master of Balliol and Mrs. Caird had at one time taken such a room, where one night a week they were at home, and on other nights other of their cultured friends were there, with flowers and music and friendly talk and sympathy, making friends with the people of the poorest streets, and creating a social tie between themselves and the dwellers in a single room or cellar. So he thought in the great blocks of dwellings now being built, there might be some provision for social life organised by those responsible for the buildings.

As to the question of temperance, he would never be silent while he could speak on such a platform as theirs, on behalf of some such scheme as that proposed in the Minority Report of Lord Peel's Commission. It was unhappily among the consequences of war that it stopped social reform, and the Prime Minister seemed to have forgotten that he had ever issued a Temperance Commission at all. But they must not rest until public opinion was aroused to demand an effective reduction of the number of public-houses.

By such measures they might prepare for the growth of that larger religion, which would no longer treat the outer conditions as something more or less hostile to the inner spirit, but should make the outward conditions and the inner spirit work together for the common good. They believed that the kingdom of God was destined to embrace the whole man; they looked for the time when the conception of Christian service should be large enough to embrace social duty, and when all that made labour noble and dignified and home life fair and beautiful should be reckoned not only part of social obligation, but as entering vitally into the essence of religion. In that spirit their missions worked, ministering to every side of life, so that body and spirit might be brought into harmonious accord towards the perfect man. Out of such a conception of life, which was growing, there would come a new transfigured Christianity, not of theological division but of true unity of life, wherein they might not always see eye to eye in the intellectual interpretations of the great facts on which religious life must always rest, but in which they would secure a place as humble servants of the Kingdom of God.

Mr. A. M. Torrance, L.C.C., seconding the motion, expressed his pleasure in meeting Mr. Martineau again on that platform, and wished that they might once more have his help on the County Council. As he understood the scope of that Mission, its aim was to bring in thoughtful, educated intelligence to raise up those who were very low and to make things better than they were; and he would say, "God prosper such work." It had been the aim of the London County Council, during the eleven years of its existence, to do those things to which the Chairman had alluded. They had in that beautiful spring-time Nature's pictures all over the parks of London, which were all for good in the lot of the working people. Attention was more and more turned to the improvement of the social condition of the people and the dwellings in which they lived. They had great difficulties to contend with, but they were being rapidly cleared away. As Chairman of the Parks Committee for two years it had been his lot to go round all the poorest quarters of London, and much had been done to obtain small open spaces. But often he had returned home from such visits sick at heart, and wondering why such a condition of things as he had seen was permitted to exist. They had in their city squalid slums which would be a disgrace to savages. Good work was being done by their Mission and by many missions. He knew from his own experience in a ragged school in Glasgow over thirty years ago that it was not only the taught, but the teacher that was benefited. He trusted their Mission would go on and prosper, and more and more get earnest souls to come and help on the cause.

The Rev. Joseph Wood proposed a resolution of confidence in the principles of the mission, and sympathy with the missionaries in their work. The visitor to London, he said, was more and more struck with the violent contrasts it presented. They had extremes in the provinces, but in London the contrasts were much more vivid, startling, and on a far more gigantic scale. There were increasing signs of wealth, luxury, and a kind of pride of life, and at the same time there was the awful lot of the toilers in the slums. There were multitudes of weary, dispirited folks to be seen passing along the streets, and vile dwellings, and whole districts given over to poverty. It was true that there was another side to London life. The bulk of Londoners were hard-working, honest folk, with more or less of happiness in their lives, or London could not hold together; for a great community was held together in peace, order, and safety, because, on the whole, its people were honest, industrious, kindly and law-abiding; that was the cement of social life. On the whole he thought Londoners might be proud of London, and especially of what it had been doing and thinking during the eleven and a-half years of the existence of its County Council. And yet the physical, moral, and religious destitution of London could not be denied, nor the urgent need of their work and generosity in such missions as that. He did not think they were doing in that mission in proportion to their numbers and their wealth what was being done in many provincial towns. London was very sick, and its disease was want of civilisation; it was barbarism, the lack of the sense of fellowship, brotherhood and citizenship. It had been too much dominated in the past by a certain selfish, brutal independence, with too little sense of common life. Fellow-men had been regarded merely as competitors in the struggle for existence rather than co-operators in a great community. But men were beginning to feel what it meant to share a collective life. The School Board and the County Council had done much in the way of actual achievement, but far more in awakening public spirit and teaching men what it was to be citizens of that great metropolis. On every hand in English life they saw the uprising of the social conscience, born of the idea that the community is a great and living organism, with duties and relations which no man might escape.

In Birmingham they were advocating that the corporation should go outside the borough and plant decent townships for the working folk, with municipal trams or railways to bring them into town, townships in the country, which should have each its own independent social life. That ideal he commended to those who were working at the housing question in London; and to the mission he also commended the example of the court concerts which had been so successful in Birmingham, with a movable platform that could be taken from court to court. Fifty concerts had been held last year, and fifty more were to be held this year. It could be done at a cost of £100.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston, in seconding the motion, spoke of the exceptional difficulties of their work in London, and the Rev. F. Summers, J. Pollard, and B. K. Gray responded.

Mr. Summers urged that supporters of the mission should read their reports, and especially should set their young people to read them and so enlist their active sympathy and help. Mr. Pollard, with much feeling, bade farewell to his friends, with grateful thanks for all the kindness and support he had received. Mr. Gray strongly appealed for more help in the work at Bell-street, and referring to the conditions under which the poor have to live, said that beyond all surface alleviation that they might administer was a deep disease demanding more effective remedies. It was not enough to make life a little more tolerable in the slums; the slums were intolerable, and must be swept away.

On the motion of the Rev. W. H. Drummond, seconded by Mr. A. Wilson, the Committee was appointed, and after a vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. P. M. Martineau, the Benediction brought the meeting to a close.

Disputes, tho' short are far too long,

LAY-PREACHING.

In Mr. Harvie's Provincial Letter concerning the state of our churches in the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, which appeared in The Inquirer of the 28th ult., there is a paragraph on lay-preaching which deserves more than a passing notice, for it opens up an important question which is well deserving of the consideration of our churches. The statement he makes "that for twelve places of worship there are only four recognised ministers," shows what an amount of useful work is done in that one district alone by our lay-preachers, and that if this agency were to cease, two-thirds of its churches would be closed. He also makes the further interesting statement that "lay-preachers are better appreciated here than in any other part of England." As one who has ever believed in lay-preaching, and been glad to encourage it wherever practicable, I would offer a few observations on the two phases of this subject, suggested by the statements I have quoted—namely, first, the work of lay-preaching, and second, its encouragement.

To those who have given any thought to this subject it must be evident that lay-preaching has an important part to perform in the work of our churches, if we have any desire to create new centres, or if we wish to save from extinction some of those now existing. It is manifest that we cannot have "a recognised minister" in every new place we open, or in many of our smaller congregations that have neither an endowment nor any wealthy members or friend outside to help them to bear the burden. To such congregations ministers are an expensive luxury they cannot afford, but surely it is not desirable for them to close their doors on that account if lay help be at all available. It is better to have but one service a Sunday, or even once a month from a layman, than to have no service at all. Nor should the difficulty of planting a minister down in every new mission debar us from the attempt to break new ground wherever there is a promising field for future success. But to do much in either of these directions we shall have to rely very largely on lay-preaching for carrying on the work. This has been one prime factor in the success of Methodism. It would have been impossible for it to spread as it did, or for it to keep open its churches to-day but for this element.

I have no data at hand to show the relative number of its present ministers and churches, but I venture to say that the latter exceed the former by even more than two-thirds. True, many of these preachers have been plain, unlettered men, like the fishermen of Galilee, speaking in their vernacular, and caring nothing, because knowing nothing, of the rules of grammar. But they were men of earnest spirit and deep piety, and their word often went home to the minds and hearts of those they addressed. Cannot we do something more in this direction than we have ever yet attempted? In our better class congregations at least, one would think it should not be difficult to find young men with aptitudes and qualifications for this work, who would be willing to take it up, not in any mercenary or vainglorious spirit, but in a spirit of self-sacrificing devotion to the faith they hold. That would be a good thing for them, and for our churches also, if taken up in such a spirit. It would be a joy to the preachers themselves, if I may speak from my own experience in my lay-preaching days. It would afford greater scope and hope for our mission work; it might help to keep the lamp burning in places where it might otherwise die out; it would lessen the difficulty which many ministers experience in getting supplies for their pulpits in case of sickness or absence; it would give those who aspire to the regular ministry opportunities for trying their wings, and for showing whether they had the requisite qualifications; and in this respect we might possibly learn something from the Wesleyans, for among them no young man is ever accepted as a student for the ministry who has not given proof that he possesses preaching power.

In the second place, lay-preaching needs more encouragement among our churches than it has yet received. Mr. Harvie's remark that the lay-preachers of the North are better appreciated than in any other part of England, implies a general lack of appreciation in our body of a most useful and deserving class of men. Is it because they are disliked as non-professionals, or because they fall below the standard of the regular ministry? Be that as it may, it can scarcely be denied that lay-preaching is not appreciated as it should be, even by working-class congregations, and it is seldom we find cultivated and well-to-do laymen occupying our pulpits. Again, why is this? We have laymen who take a high position in social and political life. They are found on various public bodies, and are frequently effective platform speakers, but it does not seem to occur to them that they can render equally effective services to their denomination by occasionally occupying the pulpits of some of our weaker congregations. In the body I have referred to above it is different. There men of wealth and position, who have any talent in that direction, are encouraged and do not refuse to take any part in this good work.

Now this seems to me to be one of the ways in which lay-preaching can be encouraged among us. If more of our educated and wealthy laymen would take this matter up they would help to raise the general standard of lay-preaching, and an occasional visit from such gentlemen to our poorer and weaker congregations would be an encouragement to them, and would afford opportunities for friendly converse, for showing sympathetic interest in their work, and for offering a word of counsel or advice on matters connected with their church life.

Another way in which lay-preaching can be encouraged is for congregations themselves to show a greater appreciation of it than is often the case. It is sometimes said that people will not come to lay-preachers, but those who stay away for such a reason can scarcely be credited with possessing very much religion, and they certainly show themselves lacking in the true spirit of worship. To go to hear a preacher rather than to worship God is not the end and aim of a Church. It is to be feared that our churches generally make too much of the sermon and too little of the worship. But that is scarcely as it should be, for if either is subordinate to the other it is surely the sermon that should come second to the worship we offer to God.

I would mention a third way in which lay preaching may be encouraged and improved. If the ministers in our leading congregations in our large cities and towns would encourage any likely young men they know to take up this work and form training classes for it, good results might be expected in larger number and greater efficiency. Dr. Herford did this at Sheffield, and I think even he will admit, with encouraging results. The classes might meet at stated time, and if not too often, lay-preachers, or any desiring to become such, in other places within easy reach, might also be glad to attend. That, however, is a matter of detail. In these various ways, I conceive, much more might be done by the agency of lay-preaching for the benefitting and strengthening of our churches.

John Fox.

"AT HOME WITH GOD."

The recent opening of the new chapel at Ciliau Aeron was reported in these columns last week. The Cambrian News, of May 18, gives a full report of the proceedings, and some interesting historical notes on the old chapel and its ministers, of whom the first and the third, Philip Pugh and David Davis, of Castell-hywel (and their associates), divided nearly the whole of the eighteenth century between them, each ministering for over fifty years, Davis continuing to preach for the first twenty years and more of the present century. The News also gives, verbatim, a translation of the sermon preached in Welsh by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, with the above title. From that sermon the following extract is taken:—

"It is true that we who worship here feel that every place is holy ground where man worships the Heavenly Father in spirit and in truth. Of every place where love dwells, and the voice of conscience is respected, it might be said in the language of the patriarchs of old: 'This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.' While I am deeply conscious of this fact, I am bound to confess that when we dedicate a house, such as that in which we are now assembled to the service of God, and set it apart as our religious home where we meet kindred spirits before the Lord our Maker, it possesses a special sacredness. It is a place where we can worship and meditate to the best advantage. We do not come here merely for instruction, or to hear a sermon, the prayers and the music; but the worship of God is the chief object of our meeting within these walls. We come together in the quietude of the day of rest to hold communion with our Father in our religious home. It is true that there should be at each service solid instruction in the art of noble living, uplifting prayers, and the sublimest strains of music, but these should be regarded as means to an end, as aids to the sincere worship of God—such whole-hearted worship as would make us obey Him in all that we do. When we view the Church as our religious home we see the need of making it as beautiful as possible. In all civilised countries, wherever men and women respect themselves, they endeavour to make their homes as beautiful as their means will allow. They adorn them with works of art—pictures, statuary, and the richest produce of the loom. They procure the best musical instruments to accompany their songs or to interpret the works of the great masters, and buy the finest books for their libraries. All this is most commendable, for all such things are important aids to the culture of the soul. On precisely the same principle I would have our religious home made really beautiful, so that each of us might be able to say from the depths of our hearts, 'One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after: that I may dwell in the House of the Lord, all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord and to inquire in His temple.' In return for the countless blessings which we daily receive from our heavenly Father's loving hand, it is only right that we should give what we can towards the adorning of the house in which we join our kindred and friends in our service of praise and prayer. With great profit to our souls we might make beauty one of the means whereby we may commune with the Supreme Author of beauty. This spot has been the religious home of some of you during the whole course of your life. Here, in your infancy, you were dedicated to the service of God by your fond parents. Here you lisped the first notes of praise in your childhood. At this place you have been kept in vital touch with those spiritual influences which have quickened your conscience and your intellect and have helped you on your heavenward way until this very hour. During many years of joy and some hours of sorrow, here you have bowed Giver of all good things and have joined those that are dearest to you in the solemn hymn of praise. It is here that you meet kindred minds from week to week and where the grip of a friend's hand, no less than the gospel of love and duty which you hear, is a means of grace to you. It is the place where you repair when your hearts are sorrowful as well as when you feel the joy of living and seek the 'peace that passeth all understanding.' To-day there is a resurrection of old memories in our hearts. If you will permit me to give my own experience, I feel that I shall not find eternity too long to thank God for the moral and spiritual benefit which I received in my early days at God's altar in this place. On this eventful day I cannot breathe a better prayer than that the young people who shall assemble in this new house shall receive the same benefit to their souls that I received in the old chapel. As the house of God is our religious home, it should be the abode of unity and peace. We all know that in a happy household every member tries to add something to the joy and comfort of all the rest. There may be a great variety of tastes and temperaments and degrees of culture, but all are bound together by the golden thread of mutual regard and the place partakes of the nature of an earthly paradise. A household in which this all-uniting love is absent is not a home. It is only a kind of prison house in which persons tolerate each other. The meaning of the Welsh word cartref —home, is the abode of love. The same law is illustrated in the Church. Now that we have made our religious home beautiful to the sight, we must also make it bright and sweet and lovely by the kind and generous feelings which pervade our hearts each time we assemble here for worship. In the name of the God of Love whom we worship, our Father, I charge you never to enter these walls unless you are prepared to leave all unkindly feelings at the threshold. Here we are all expected to meet as brethren of one mind and one spirit who are animated by a profound desire to help and encourage each other as we pass down the vale of years.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

IRELAND.

IRISH Unitarians, who are very like English Unitarians in a certain inability to understand why their faith should not be deemed as good as anybody else's, have just had to put up with a rebuff. Our people here present very much the same differences of judgment on the questions of the day as their friends across the channel, and certainly we are not one whit behind you in loyalty to Queen and country. So, when Her Gracious Majesty announced her intention of coming to Ireland, we prepared, along with others of her dutiful and loyal subjects, to bid her welcome. Our Non-subscribing Association appointed a special committee to draw up and present an address, as had been done on like occasions in years gone by. So we did our best. Our address—and a very handsome piece of work it seemed when Mr. Vinycomb had engrossed it—set forth our great pleasure in Her Majesty's visit, our appreciation of the benefits that had come to us by her long rule, our joy at her recognition of the bravery and devotion of her Irish soldiers at the war, and our trust that the South African trouble might soon end in the establishment of a firm and lasting peace. We tried to make our address an expression of our best and sincerest thoughts and hopes. And then we waited for instructions as to its due presentation. Alas! the Methodists were allowed to present their address, and the orthodox Presbyterians theirs, and the Episcopalians theirs; but we poor Non-subscribers had to content ourselves to forward ours by the humble if handy methods of the penny post. It was a disappointment. We are a loyal and patriotic people; we have our pride of citizenship; and we do not recognise that our religious faith disqualifies us for privileges to which our neighbours of the Methodist and Episcopalian Churches are admitted. But these things lie on the knees of the gods; and all we can do now is to see to it that our disappointment shall not make us less earnest or less loyal or diminish our happy thankfulness that Her Majesty had a real good time in Ireland, enjoyed her visit, is better in health for it, and talks about coming again next year.

Of our churches here the news is good and bad, the best of all being that there is little to tell. Happy is the congregation that is not making history. Our men are working on quietly and faithfully, and there is little just now to mar the even tenor of their way. As some of us know only too well, such a time brings the hardest trial of all; new movements, special efforts, times when there's something "on," something "agate," as some old friends of mine used to say—it's easy work then. But it's the "long pull" that tires and tests a man, when the special effort is over and the jog-trot commonplace begins. As Charles Kingsley sang:

> Oh, it is easy
> To beget great deeds, but in the rearing of them,
> The threading in cold blood each mean detail
> And furze-brake of half-pertinent circumstance—
> There lies the self-denial.

If we have little to report to such as wish for news, it by no means follows that our churches have lost either faith or hope.

But Dromore is vacant, though, if report be true, the vacancy is shortly to be filled. Good David Thompson passed onward to his rest three months ago, after a long and trying illness. He had been unable for a while to throw himself, as he had done in his day of health and strength, into the more active duties of his work in the busy little country town; but not a man in Dromore was better known or better loved, or more sincerely honoured. His successor will enjoy the prestige of an honourable pulpit tradition; he will have a grand opportunity of usefulness; and he will find that his congregation has plenty of life in it and plenty of devotional spirit.

Belfast is losing Mr. Fripp. Not alone the congregation of All Souls, which is sore at heart to part with him, but many good interests in this "Athens of the North" will be the poorer by his going away. The handsome church in which his people meet for worship is the enduring memorial of his zeal in their service; and when next winter's University Extension lectures are arranged there will be a vacant place in the list that will speak eloquently of work which he has done for a wider public. He goes to Mansfield bearing with him the esteem and good wishes of all here. To be sure he does not take precisely the same view of certain matters as most of us do, and we have found in Unitarianism bigger and better meanings than he has been able to read there. But in a great house, as Paul has it, there is room for all sorts of vessels; and in the ministry of our Free Churches there is room for very great diversities of conviction and method. It is good when we will recognise that so it is, and rather rejoice at it than care to quarrel about it. "May the rosy wing of friendship never moult a feather!"

I should like to say a good word for Ballyclare. Our people there, with Mr. Fielding at their head, are anxious to raise some £500—I think it is—for the repair of their Meeting-house. It's a poor encouragement to attend worship when you know that at any moment the church roof may come tumbling about your ears. And so, next month, Ballyclare holds a bazaar, and who ever will help may be assured that his goodwill will not be wasted. Memories of bygone troubles hang about Ballyclare; and of all the churches that suffered by the contentions of former days, Ballyclare, perhaps, suffered most. But the fires are out now; old enmities are done with; rival presbyteries are re-united; and the "destructions" which their strife led on to are "come to a perpetual end." With their old church made habitable again, and with encouragement, it may be hoped, from the sympathy and goodwill of comrades in the faith, there is a future of honour and usefulness before our congregation.

Our Irish churches were well represented, it was pleasant to see, at the Leicester Conference, and those of us who worked our hardest to bring the Conference over to Belfast were almost envious of Leicester's opportunity of good work in the common cause. Will our turn come? It would do us a power of good. It would convince our people here that English and Irish Unitarians "and other Free Christians" are of the very same household of faith, and it will be well to give the fact fuller recognition. And it would help our English Unitarians to profit by knowledge of some of our methods. There are a few things which we here have got right—and English people do not know it. Mr. Odgers, for example, pleading with the Conference that church organisations should take up the work of looking after any of our young men who might be trained for the ministry, quoted the example of the Presbyteries of the Scottish Kirk. Why should he not have instanced work that our own presbyteries are doing here? Not only have we the organisation and the needed funds for taking charge of candidates and students for the ministry, but we are actually doing the work for which Mr. Odgers pleaded at this very hour, hoping in due course to send our students up to college. Quotation of Irish Unitarian methods would have seemed to some of us at least as appropriate at the Leicester meeting as quotation of the ways of Scotch Calvinism. But, indeed, English and Irish Unitarianism will both be the better for some further mutual understanding. I speak of this matter with some confidence, for "I ha' tried baith."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Blackley.—The annual sermons were preached on the 13th inst. by the Rev. John Ellis, of Sheffield. In the afternoon the choir, assisted by friends, rendered Pattison's cantata Amos. There were excellent congregations, and the collections amounted to £21 5s.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The school sermons were preached on Sunday, May 20. At the morning service the devotional exercises were conducted by the Rev. H. M. Livens, the address being given by Miss Mary Dendy, of Manchester, who spoke earnestly to the children and their parents about workmen who need and workmen who need not to be ashamed. In the afternoon and evening the Rev. John Byles, of Northampton, preached, giving wise counsel and encouragement to teachers drawn from his own wide experience. There were large congregations at all the services. The beautiful weather drew out a great company of scholars and their parents to join in the procession and open-air singing before the morning service. The chapel was very tastefully decorated, and special hymns and anthems sung by the choir and the children. The latter had been carefully trained by Mr. Joseph Lancaster, jun. The collections for the day amounted to over £43, of which £12 10s. 6½d. was contributed by the scholars since the beginning of the year, and was handed in to the offertory by the youngest child in the school

Burnley.—A meeting was held on Saturday, May 19, at the Trafalgar-road Church, to welcome the Rev. E. A. Voysey, B.A., the newly-appointed minister. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. S. Holden, who, together with Mr. Councillor Bibby and Mr. J. S. Mackie, on behalf of the Sunday-school, and Mr. J. T. Bibby and Mr. P. J. Hargreaves on behalf of other institutions connected with the church, offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Voysey. Mr. Voysey, in reply, thanked them all very much for the sincere and warm welcome that they had given to him and Mrs. Voysey. When he came there for the first time, as candidate, he was much impressed by the earnest devotion displayed by all of them, and said to himself: "This is the church I will have, if they will have me," and when he went home, and his wife asked him what sort of place it was, he said, "It is very dirty, but the people are clean-hearted." He thanked God he had become their minister, and he hoped to have a long and prosperous ministry among them. He was glad that the previous speakers had all emphasised the importance of their being united in their work. He wished to be their friend, and he wished them to feel that they could trust him, and confide in him without any fear of his making mischief. He didn't want to start confession—he was not a Ritualist, but he did want to get at their hearts. With regard to the Sunday-school, one of his chief duties and pleasures would be to look after the children, and he hoped to get thoroughly in touch with every thing in their church life. The Rev. W. H. Burgess, on behalf of the Sunday-school Union, the Rev. J. H, Hirst of the Bethel Primitive Methodist Chapel, who said that any man who helped them towards truth and righteousness should have the right hand of fellowship from him, and the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed joined in the welcome. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong was the next speaker. Having referred with pleasure to the freedom Unitarians had in Burnley, as regarded membership in the Free Church Council, he said that he had never been at a meeting of welcome to a minister where so many letters of sympathetic interest and welcome had been read from orthodox clergy and ministers in the town; and he had rarely been at such a meeting when an orthodox Christian church was actually represented by its minister. He referred to the controversy which had occurred in consequence of the entrance of Mr. Ellison Voysey into the Unitarian ministry, and he rejoiced to think that the efforts which were then made by a small section of Unitarians to narrow down the meaning of the name Unitarian, and to impose doctrinal tests upon ministers, failed to receive general support. He welcomed any man who strove to teach, and to live as if he believed in the Fatherhood of God. He cared nothing for the name by which men called themselves. As far as his own feelings were concerned, he did not dare to aspire after the name Christian. He only strove to follow him who had taught men to trust in God's fatherly love. And any man who would devote himself to the task of helping others to believe in and love God, deserved to have the hand of fellowship stretched out to him. For he believed that the love of God, as a Father, when truly felt, was the greatest power in a human life. In conclusion, he referred to the activity of the church, and its institutions, and he felt bound to say that if they wished to have Mr. Voysey for a long time they must not work him too hard. He must be allowed to have a quiet hour in his home with his wife, and must not be torn to pieces by continual engagements. It was not the minister who did the most work who did the best work. It was not doing, but being, and their cause would flourish better if their minister were allowed a quiet life of his own, and occasionally visited them, and if they knew him as their friend. Letters of regret for absence and good wishes were received from the Hon. Mrs. de Beaumont Klein, who had been asked to take the chair; the Revs. Charles Jones, vicar of St. Andrew's; W. S. Matthews, vicar of Briercliffe; the Wesleyan superintendent, and several other Nonconformist ministers; also from the Revs. J. J. Shaw, T. Leyland, and Mr. Frank Taylor, of Bolton.

Burton-on-Trent.—The first anniversary of the Burton Unitarian Society was held on Sunday, May 6, when a good congregation assembled at the Town Hall, the regular place of meeting, the room being nearly filled. The Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., of Derby, preached in the evening, the subject being—"Are Unitarians Christians?" The Lessons were read by Mr. Fritchley, of Derby. The Essex Hall Hymnal has been introduced, and the hymns were heartily sung to popular tunes, the arrangements for the music being in the hands of friends from Derby, who accompanied their minister, and rendered valuable help in the service, which was the sixth of the Ten Services Liturgy. The solo, "Angels Ever Bright and Fair," and the duet, "Love Divine," were given with good effect. Liberal collections were made in aid of the cause.

Chester.—At the annual meeting of the congregation of Matthew Henry's Chapel, held on May 16, the minister's report recorded a year of steady progress. It was stated that during the four years' ministry of the Rev. H. D. Roberts subscriptions and collections had doubled, and £700 had been raised for the re-roofing and restoration of the chapel. Great regret was expressed at Mr. Roberts's resignation on accepting the post of Missionary minister to the Liverpool District Association.

Darlington.—A sale of work in aid of the church funds was opened on Thursday, May 10, by Miss Lucas, who was introduced by Mr. E. Cox-Walker. The congregation are anxious to make alterations in the schoolroom and improve the church.

Evesham.—The Protestant Dissenting ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties held their spring meeting at Evesham on Wednesday, 23rd inst. After service in the Oat-street Chapel at 12.15, when the Rev. Ernest Betham, of Stratford-on-Avon, was the preacher, the business meeting was held, and at two the members of the congregation entertained the ministers and other friends at luncheon in the schoolroom, about sixty-five being present. Mr. A. H. Martin, J.P., gave the toast of "The Queen," received with musical honours and cheers, and of "The Ministers' Meeting," responded to by the Rev. Henry McKean. The Rev. L. P. Jacks proposed "The Preacher," and Mr. Betham responded. The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth proposed "Religious Liberty all the World Over," to which the Rev. J. C. Street responded; and the Rev. E. P. Hall "Ministers and Members of other Evesham Congregations," responded to by the Rev. F. Standfast, Wesleyan minister, and Mr. J. S. Slater, J.P., a member of the Baptist Congregation. The Rev. W. Lloyd toasted "The Evesham Congregation," and Mr. Geoffrey New, Mayor of Evesham, and chairman of the congregation, responded. The Rev. Peter Dean proposed the health of "The Chairman," and at the close of the proceedings Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Martin invited the luncheon party and all members of the Oat-street congregation to their garden for the afternoon.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will preach at Essex Church on Sunday morning next, and also on the five following Sundays.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The Rev. C. Peach preached on Sunday last, in the morning, on "The Indian Famine," and in the evening on "The Burden of Empire." Collections were taken in church and school on behalf of our local Famine Fund, amounting to £9.

Newbury.—The annual tea—postponed from Good Friday through illness in several families of the congregation—was held at the Presbyterian Chapel on the 16th inst., followed by a public meeting, under the chairmanship of the minister, the Rev. E. Turland. Presents of books were made to the Sunday scholars, and a programme of music and recitations was executed by them with much credit to the young performers and pleasure to their audience. A thrilling recitation of "The Eidelweiss," by the chairman, and hymn, "All Good Night," brought to a close a very enjoyable evening.

Oxford: Charles-street Institute.—The sum of £1 12s. has been sent to Miss J. Upton for the Sunday-school by Miss Bland, one of those who took part in the Summer Session for Teachers at Manchester College last year, that amount having been derived from the sale of photographs taken during the Session.

Rawtenstall—On Sunday, May 13, a very successful Sunday-school anniversary was held, the Rev. A. Doel, of Chorley, being the preacher. On Monday evening Mr. Doel delivered his popular lecture on "Life, Light, and Duty." All the services were exceedingly well attended and highly appreciated. Councillor James Lupton, an old scholar and inhabitant of Rawtenstall, presented to the collection a cheque for £5 5s. from Mrs. Alice Crook, of Chorley. The collections for the anniversary were £43 9s.

Rochdale.—A bazaar, which has for its object to remove debts amounting to about £400 on the church and school, and to form the nucleus of a fund for further improvements and extensions, was opened on Thursday, May 17, by Mr. Robert D. Holt, of Liverpool, under the presidency of the Mayor of Rochdale. In his speech Mr. Holt (who is descended from an old Rochdale family) referred to the fact that his father, the late Mr. George Holt, laid the foundation-stone of the Blackwater-street Chapel, where the services are now regularly held. There was a large attendance, the bazaar being favoured by beautiful weather. Several handsome subscriptions were announced, and there was a large and valuable assortment of goods, evidencing the energetic spirit with which, during the past four months, the Rochdale people have worked. The bazaar on the second day was opened by Alderman T. B. Wood, J.P., of Middleton, an original trustee of the Blackwater-street Chapel, Alderman J. R. Heape being in the chair. On Saturday Alderman W. B. Bowring, of Liverpool, who was to have been the opener, was unfortunately prevented by ill-health from being present. At the close the receipts amounted to nearly £940, so that after paying expenses and clearing off the debt, it is hoped to have at least £400 towards the fund of £1,000 aimed at for proposed alterations and extension of church and schools.

South Cheshire and District Association and Sunday-school Union.—On Thursday afternoon, May 17, the annual conference was held at Nantwich. The tenth annual report, which was received and adopted, gave an account of the meetings that had been held during the year. The report of the Visitor (the Rev. R. Stuart Redfern, of Crewe) recorded the official visits that had been made to the schools at Chester, Congleton, Crewe, and Shrewsbury, in which satisfactory work had been done. In seven years there had been an increase in the six schools of the Union of 90 scholars on the books, and of 46 in average attendance; also of 11 teachers in average attendance. The President (the Rev. G. A. Payne) moved, and Mr. Vincent (Shrewsbury) seconded, the adoption of the report. On the motion of the Rev. J. C. Street, the officers were appointed, the Rev. G. A. Payne succeeding the Rev. J. M. Mills as secretary, to the value of whose services warm tributes were paid. The Rev. Charles Peach, representing the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, representing the Liverpool Sunday-school Society, were heartily welcomed by the President, and each replied in an interesting speech. At the close of the conference tea was served in the schoolroom, and afterwards a service was held in the chapel, when the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Liscard, preached an eloquent sermon on "The Church and the Christian."

The Scottish Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—A meeting of friends interested in Sunday-school work was held in the hall of St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, on Saturday last, when the above Union was formed, an outcome of a preliminary meeting at Dundee in November last. Mr. James Graham, Glasgow, occupied the chair, and there were present the Revs. R. B. Drummond, B.A., A. Ernest Parry, E. T. Russell, Alexander Webster, and Henry Williamson, and about thirty others. A letter was read from the Rev. A. C. Henderson, M.A., B.D., regretting his absence. The proceedings began with tea, followed by hymn and prayer. The Chairman then welcomed those present, and said he was pleased to occupy the chair at a meeting of a society which had for its objects the promotion of Sunday-school work in Scotland, and the encouragement of all engaged in that work. The instruction of the young in the fundamentals of our liberal faith, and, above all, the moral and spiritual teaching of children were of vital importance. The rules of the Union were agreed upon, and the following office-bearers appointed:—President, Mr. James Graham; vice-presidents, Messrs. A. Godsell (Hull), and H. B. Melville and Miss Moffat; treasurer, Mr. G. Reeves; secretary, Mr. J. K. Melville, 92, High-street, Kirkcaldy. The Rev. R. B. Drummond read a brief paper on "The Importance of Unitarian Teaching in the Sunday-school." He urged that it was a great mistake to allow children to pass through our schools without obtaining some knowledge of Unitarian principles and of the differences between our faith and that of other Churches. They ought so to be instructed in the school that they might be able to answer the question why they are Unitarians. The elements of religion and morality were of primest importance, but the elements of our theological position and lessons on the origin, structure and character of the Bible, for example, were too important to be left altogether on one side. A comprehensive vote of thanks to Mr. Drummond for his paper, to the St. Mark's teachers for the tea, to the Chairman for presiding, and to the Rev. Mr. Parry for his work of organisation as secretary pro tem. was carried, the meeting concluding with hymn and benediction.

Wolverhampton.—The second of the series of re-opening services was held on Sunday last in the iron schoolroom, Bath-road. The Rev. William Lindsay, of Christ Church, Nottingham, conducted the service, and preached a thoughtful sermon from the text: "With freedom did Christ set us free, stand fast therefore and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage." The attendance was fair, but not so large as on the previous Sunday.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—The Misses Meyer, £3 3s.; Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, £10; Miss Wrigley, £1; Mrs. Aspland, £1 1s.; Mr. Charles Jecks, £1.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

IN a recent note on the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association we spoke of our own Association as founded on the same day; but in turning to the records we find that to have been a mistake. On Wednesday, May 25, 1825, the day on which the American Association was founded, our Unitarian Fund held its nineteenth annual meeting at Finsbury Chapel, and then adjourned until the following day, when, after the annual meeting of the Unitarian Association for the Protection of Civil Rights, at the London Tavern, the supporters of these two societies agreed to unite their forces, and founded the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, "For the promotion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity at home and abroad, the support of its worship, the diffusion of biblical, theological, and literary knowledge on topics connected with it, and the maintainance of the civil rights and interests of its professors."

THE meetings of next week will therefore celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Association, of which Robert Aspland was the first secretary, and William Johnson Fox the foreign secretary. John Christie was the first treasurer, and Edgar Taylor the solicitor. The Committee included the Revs. James Gilchrist, Thomas Madge, and Dr. Rees, Dr. Southwood Smith, John Bowring, J. T. Rutt, Edward and Richard Taylor. The first annual sermon was preached in Finsbury Chapel, on Wednesday, May 17, 1826, by Dr. Lant Carpenter, of Bristol.

THE Communion service which is to be held at the Unitary Church, Islington, at half-past ten on Wednesday morning, prior to the annual service of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has been arranged by the London Ministers' Meeting, in response to wishes expressed both in London and the country for such a service, in which visitors from the country and members of our London congregations could be united. The service is to be conducted by the Revs. Dr. Brooke Herford, and Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, assisted by the Revs. Dr. Hicks, E. S. Anthony, and J. E. Stronge.

VISITORS to Essex Hall next week will find ranged round the Council Room, a number of pictures and engravings, which are on sale for the Bazaar Fund. They are now marked at two-thirds only of the price in the Art Gallery catalogue. Amongst them are pictures by Vicat Cole, R.A., G. Wetherbee, R.I., J. Hill, R.I., and Miss E. Martineau, R.W.S.; and engravings after Sir L. Alma Tadema, R.A., Sir J. E. Millais, R.A., Briton Rivière, R.A., G. D. Leslie, R.A., and Keeley Halswelle. There are also several small pictures and unframed engravings which can be seen on application.

AT the Jubilee meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, the President, Sir John Brunner, referred to the Bishop of Calcutta's striking tribute to Dr. Martineau, and as will be seen from the report in our present issue, expressed his incredulity that Dr. Martineau could ever have said, as Dr. Welldon recorded, that he was glad that the Athanasian view of Christ had prevailed over the Arian in the fourth century. In a note in THE INQUIRER of May 12, we gave what we take to be the right interpretation of this saying, which we have no doubt represents Dr. Martineau's real opinion, and we are glad to be allowed to add here a passage from a letter from Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, to whom we wrote on the subject:—

"Though I cannot remember any particular occasion when I heard Dr. Martineau expressing his views about Athanasius, I feel no doubt that his opinion was correctly reported by the Bishop. Mr. Tayler, if I am not greatly mistaken, was decidedly on the same side. As to the grounds for this preference I am not so clear, but probably your note of May 12 gives a correct representation of them. Perhaps we may add that the system of Arius was far too artificial to become a permanent centre of faith. In the metaphysics of the time the question was whether the Reason (Thought or Logos) of God belonged eternally to the Divine essence, or was a created Being, so that once God was without his Logos. According to Arius the instrument of creation was himself part of creation, and it was this secondary and created God who appeared in Christ, and gave only such an imperfect revelation as was within the power of a creature. This system was charged with restoring polytheism."

Some further opinions on this subject will be found in the letter of the Rev. H. W. Perris in another column.

THE Passion play at Oberammergau, the first representation of which took place on May 20, is being performed this year in the new theatre, in which every seat is under cover. The tableaux of the Fish casting up Jonah and the drowning of the Egyptians are no longer given, and the last traces of anything grotesque in the performance seem to have disappeared. Joseph Mayr, who was the Christus of former years, has given place to Anton Lang, a much younger man, and now appears as Choragus. Lang is described as a master potter, with long curling hair and beard—"a gentle, comely face, the complexion fair, the eyes blue and gracious, altogether a great contrast to the rugged though majestic presence of his predecessor." The performances are to continue until the end of September.

THE Southwark and Lambeth Free Loan Exhibition of Pictures at the Borough Polytechnic Institute was opened on Saturday last by Sir L. Alma Tadema R.A., Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., being in the chair. Among the speakers were Mrs. Humphry Ward, Mr. Melton Fisher, the Rev. A. Jephson, Mr. C. J. Harris, the Rev. J. W. Horsley, and Sir Joshua Fitch. The pictures to the number of 116 occupied two rooms. They include examples of the work of Millais, Watts, Edwin Long, David Cox, Herkomer, Sargent, and G. A. Storey. Sir L. Alma Tadema said that he was always amazed at competency displayed by the South Kensington Art centre, and its affiliated schools. A deputation from Buda Pesth had begged that the South Kensington exhibits of students' work might be shown in the Hungarian capital. Mrs. Humphry Ward, who has just returned from Italy and Paris, referring to the portrait of Miss Octavia Hill, by Sargent, described how that lady's method of housing the poor has been adopted in Rome, and how enthusiastically a Roman parish priest had spoken of Miss Hill. The Exhibition, which will remain open till June 17, is being held for the eleventh time.

THE proceedings of the summer session for Sunday-school teachers, held at Manchester College, Oxford, last year, have been reprinted by the Sunday School Association from The Helper of 1900, and as a volume of 170 pages, with the capital view of the college as frontispiece, in paper covers, may be had for sixpence. Teachers who have not got the volume of The Helper should make a point of securing this valuable collection of papers and addresses, and notes of a most delightful gathering. We may add that entries for the second summer session, to be held at Oxford from July 6 to 14, are now being received, and it is hoped that a large number of schools may be represented. We have already noted that 150 is the limit of the numbers that can be received.

FOR the Leicester Conference is was found possible to arrange with the Railway companies for reduced fares, but for meetings in London the same advantages are not offered, and visitors who are coming up for the Whit-week meetings will have to pay ordinary fares.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.—At the last meeting of the Committee the treasurer announced that he had received a sum of £1,200, subscribed by twelve trustees, to enable him to wipe off all outstanding debits and start the College on its career in the new century free of debt.

NOT to understand a treasure's worth
Till time has stolen away the slighted good,
Is cause of half the poverty we feel,
And makes the world the wilderness it is.—Cowper.

ANOTHER WHITSUNTIDE MEETING.

SIR,—We desire to draw the attention of Unitarians and other visitors to London during Whit-week to the full announcement in your advertising columns of the meeting at Clifford's-inn Hall, next Thursday afternoon, to protest against the suppression of free speech in England, and to consider our duty in relation to the war in South Africa.

We have received many letters expressing sympathy with the objects of the meeting, and shall be glad to forward tickets to any who desire to discuss the question quietly. We regret the necessity for tickets. They are only used to ensure those who desire to express their opinions in a peaceable and law-abiding manner the opportunity of obtaining a hearing.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

THE STUDY OF COMPARATIVE RELIGION.

III.

The Sacred Books of the East (i.).

WHEN Demetrius Phalereus was librarian at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus in the middle of the third century B.C., he is said to have conceived the bold idea of making a collection of all the books to be found in the world. The Christian writers Eusebius and Epiphanius credited him with a special desire to gather the sacred books of the Ethiopians, Indians, Persians, Elamites, Babylonians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Romans, Phœnicians, Syrians, and Greeks. The good fathers were doubtless led away by their rhetorical zeal in this wide enumeration. The idea which it represents, however, is an interesting one. In the light of the best knowledge of the first centuries of our era, cultivated minds were well aware that some of the greatest doctrines of religion and morals existed in various forms among many races. So far was this fact from exciting apprehension, that it deserved rather to be welcomed with joy. The loyal disciple of Jesus could hail the truth wherever he saw it: "whatever things have been rightly said among all men," declared Justin the Martyr, "are the property of us Christians."

In the contraction of knowledge which followed the decline of the older Greek culture, and the erection of a rigid orthodoxy as a barrier of separation between the Church and the rest of the world, the broad and sympathetic outlook of early Christianity upon Gentile faiths was changed into hostility and mistrust. Not till the great movement of the eighteenth century for the liberation of the mind from ecclesiastical domination, indicated in the French Revolution on the one hand, and in German philosophy on the other, did a new attitude become possible. In this country, indeed, the supremacy of the Evangelical party checked any great advance in this direction, though English scholars in India were fast bringing facts to light which were destined to have a most powerful influence on the popular theology. We have already seen how this century has witnessed the recovery of great collections of religious literature in Egypt and in Mesopotamia; it was reserved for the University of Oxford, under the persuasive guidance of Professor Max Müller, to surpass the effort of Demetrius, and put before the English-speaking race all round the world translations of the Sacred Books of the East, 1876-1900. One continent is the mother of them all: Arabia has its Qorân, Persia its Zend Avesta, India and China their vast and varied aggregations of canonical scriptures. But from the Red Sea to the North Pacific Asia is their common home. What are the discoveries which have made such an achievement possible? A few words must suffice to indicate the great process in India.

The Jesuit missionaries were the first to study the varieties of native speech, and to find out that behind the modern vernaculars lay an ancient tongue displaying astonishing resemblances to the languages of Southern Europe. The facts mentioned in their correspondence, however, attracted no attention, and it was not till English arms had established English government and brought English scholars into its service, that any real progress could be made. The first impulse was given by the foundation of the Asiatic Society of Calcutta in 1784, under the auspices of Sir William Jones, and a distinguished band of fellow-workers. In the next year appeared the first translation of the famous Bhagavad Gitā, the "Divine Lay," in which the spiritual philosophy of Brahmanism finds its most characteristic poetical expression. The "Asiatic Researches" rapidly made known the results of English inquiry into the ancient literature, the beliefs and usages, of the Hindus. Before long, however, the centre of interest was removed to Europe, and Frederick Schlegel inaugurated the modern science of language by his work on "The Language and Wisdom of the Indians" in 1808. From that date Germany took the lead in philological study, the indispensable preliminary to historical investigation. The results for the classification of languages, and the ethnological theories dependent on it, do not properly belong to the field of comparative religion. But it was not unnatural that the concentration of attention on linguistic detail should have delayed the production of the sacred texts, and it was not till the first half of the century was all but complete that the first instalment of the editio princeps of the Rig Veda was published by Max Müller in 1849.

Every one now has heard of these ancient hymns, sung by the Aryan forefathers of the Hindus, who entered India from the North-West. Every one knows the outlines of the simple society to which they belonged, before caste in its modern form had appeared, or the claims of an exclusive hierarchy had been definitely established. And every one knows how the term Veda, which is simply "knowledge," came to cover a gigantic literature which grew up around the sacred hymns. Most important among these were three separate groups. First come the treatises (called Brāhmanas) recording the ritual of sacrifice, describing the proper ceremonial order, and setting forth the functions of different orders of priests. They are often full of tedious and minute detail; but they contain all kinds of mythical deposit gathering round the traditional rites; they set forth a mystical and unique theory of sacrifice; and they form an unrivalled collection of priestly lore. The layman's duty was expounded in books of sacred law, which supply precious materials for the study of social conditions in different parts of India. And the beginnings of philosophical speculation were comprised in certain treatises attached to some of the Brāhmanas, known as Upanishads, recording the "guesses at truth" by men who had given up the householder's duties, perhaps even abandoned all tendance of the sacred fire, and gone forth into the forest to live the life of the mendicant and devotee. Many of these works are now printed in Europe; and specimens of all these different kinds of religious literature will be found in the "Sacred Books of the East."

But these were only the beginnings. Out of the dim light of ancient tradition emerged colossal epics, depositories of manifold varieties of belief; systems of philosophy, in which the utmost boldness of speculation contrived to shelter itself within the fold of Brahmanical orthodoxy; and collections of imaginative detail about the constitution of the universe, and its perpetual processes of decay and renovation. Most interesting of all, perhaps, was the claim raised on behalf of the Vedic hymns that they were of infallible authority, and not only so, but that they were actually eternal. The particular poems, transmitted century after century by the long-established methods of Brahmanical teaching, were only copies of originals which dwelt everlastingly in a supersensual world. There they had been beheld by the "seers" who first reproduced them on our earth, by no process of literary composition, but by a kind of spiritual transmission from the archetypes above. It is a strange parallel to the faith which made the ideal essence of the Zend Avesta an object of the believer's adoration, or which affirmed that before God created the earth he looked into that Law which Moses afterwards gave to his people at Sinai. The doctrine of the inerrancy of the Veda and its transcendental existence was defended with arguments of singular subtlety in the name of philosophy. But when it was set beside a similar claim of infallibility on behalf of the Bible, did it not become apparent that both pretensions sprang out of common tendencies in the human mind, and that neither could establish itself in fact?

The chronology of India is notoriously confused, owing to the absence of any monumental evidence for its earlier periods, and the lack of historical sense in its literature. Trustworthy materials, however, are not altogether wanting. The volume of the "Asiatic Researches" for 1801 contained a copy of an inscription on a pillar which had been carried to Delhi by Firuz Shah. By degrees some others in similar character were brought to light from different localities, and in 1838 Prinsep announced his discovery of the alphabet in which they were written, and read their contents. They were the famous inscriptions of Asoka, often designated the Constantine of Buddhism. The mention of contemporaries, an Antiochus, a Ptolemy, and other Greek princes, fixed their date in the middle of the third century, and a secure base was thus found for the early history of Buddhism, the records of which were just then for the first time made known. Colebrooke had already directed his attention to the subject. As early as 1804 he had written to his father from India, "I have lately obtained a considerable addition of authentic and important information on the religion and mythology of the Buddhists. Everything relative to a religion which has spread even more widely than the Christian or the Mohammedan faiths, is particularly interesting. I shall employ the first moment of leisure I can spare to publish this curious information, which will elucidate the accounts before obtained in China, Japan, Siam, Pegu, Ceylon, and Tibet." Twenty years, however, were to pass before any important discovery was made. Then a young civilian, Mr. Bryan Hodgson (who died only a few years ago), during his sojourn in Nepal as assistant to the Political Resident, forwarded to Calcutta in 1824 no less than sixty MS. volumes containing some of the sacred books of Buddhism in Sanskrit. But the band of scholars which Sir William Jones had inspired a generation before was now dispersed; and it was not till 1882 that a distinguished Hindu Sanskritist, the late Rajendra Lal Mitra, described the collection. Others were despatched to London, where they were equally ignored. Only in Paris did a similar gift find a scholar who could appreciate it, and the great Eugène Burnouf by his translation of the "Lotus of the Good Law" opened the way into the heart of the advanced theistic Buddhism. While Hodgson was working in Nepal, the adventurous Hungarian scholar, Csoma de Körös, travelled on foot into Tibet, and there disclosed the gigantic canonical aggregations of the Buddhism of Central Asia, while Dr. Schmidt in 1830 reported from Mongolia that he had identified in that northern land translations of 218 Buddhist works named by Hodgson.

These treatises, however, were all of relatively late origin, and threw no real light on the origins of the faith. The next step in advance was to come from Ceylon. In 1837 the Hon. George Turnour published the Pāli text of the first thirty-eight chapters of the "Mahāvamsa," the "Great Chronicle" of Ceylon. It related the early legendary history of the island, the establishment of its dynasties, the arrival of the Buddhist mission under Mahinda, son of King Asoka, and the conversion of the island to Buddhism. The picture of the religion of the Buddha given in this book was in marked contrast to that derived from the Sanskrit sources. It then became known that Ceylon also had its sacred collection, entitled the "Three Pitakas" (or Baskets), and these began to attract the attention of a very able Wesleyan missionary, Dr. Gogerly. Another missionary, Mr. Spence Hardy, made a minute analysis of the Ceylonese representations of the Buddha and his teachings, but no one was found to undertake the laborious task of producing the Pāli texts themselves. At last a Danish scholar, Fausböll, of Copenhagen, took up the work. European investigators, however, were so busy over Sanskrit that they had no time for anything else. But in 1875 Professor Childers published his Pāli dictionary: four years later (under the auspices of the India Office and the Berlin Academy of Sciences) Professor Oldenberg began the publication of the "Vinaya Pitaka," the guide to conduct for the Buddhist Order, and in 1881, at a Hibbert Lecture, Professor Rhys Davids announced the formation of the Pāli Text Society. The scholars of Europe have been roused at last, and the sacred books of early Buddhism will soon be transferred from their palm-leaves into print.

The study of Buddhism, when its full significance is seriously grasped, cannot fail to have a profound influence on our conceptions of Christianity. Five hundred years before our era the Teacher passed to and fro in the Ganges valley, proclaiming a way of life which would deliver men from the bondage of sin. Within a hundred and fifty years of his death the traditions about him appear to be substantially complete. He is miraculously conceived, and wondrously born. On his name day a venerable Brahman predicts his future greatness. As he steps forth on his great quest of truth, the god of enjoyment tempts him from his search by a promise of imperial sovereignty. He preaches the establishment of a kingdom of righteousness, and sends forth his disciples two and two to carry his message among all classes of men. He, too, is a sower of the word. He, too, can tell of a treasure hidden in the field. He, too, can heal the sick, and feed five hundred brethren at once from a small basket of cakes. A disciple on his way to hear him finds that in the absence of a boat he can walk across the surface of a river; in the middle the waves affright him, and he begins to sink; but he makes his act of joyful confidence in the Buddha firm, and proceeds securely to the other side. He is transfigured within three months of his death, which he predicts. And he does all this as a man. Early Buddhism is really a system of ethical culture; and the conception entertained of its founder is strictly humanitarian. But by and by a change takes place. The details of the process are still obscure, though the general results are sufficiently clear.

By the aid of a theory which assumes the form of a kind of Messianic hope in the Pāli texts, he is identified with a being who appears in the schools of spiritual philosophy as the Self-existent, the Absolute, the Eternal. The historical Gotama, who was supposed to have passed out of existence altogether, who was never an object of worship, but only of devoted commemoration, is now regarded, four centuries after his death, as a temporary manifestation in an earthly form of the Infinite and Everlasting. He is accessible at all times to his disciples, and the purpose of his self-revelation is that they may become partakers of his divine nature. Adoration is directed to him; by prayer, by study of the scriptures, by meditation in holy places, the devout Buddhist enters into living communion with his heavenly Lord; and the different experiences of the Evangelical and the Catholic Christian are reproduced in similar types sub specie Buddhae.

In this form Buddhism passes out of India into China, Mongolia, and Central Asia. In the long struggle with Brahmanism in its original home, its elder rival finally triumphs. But the Hinduism which holds the field after Buddhism has decayed, is very different from the religions which preceded its rise. The influence of the great personality of Gotama is everywhere apparent, in the development of new moral ideals. The conception of self-sacrifice for the good of others which pervades the whole story of the Buddha, often in such extravagant and fantastic shapes, is transferred (we know not by what steps) to Vishnu. He, too, becomes again and again incarnate for the welfare of the world—an idea of which there is no trace in pre-Buddhistic Brahmanism. This receives its highest expression in the Bhagavad Gitā ("Sacred Books of the East," vol. viii.), which represents the new movement when Buddhism has declined. It preaches a doctrine of spiritual knowledge by faith; and in the person of Krishna offers to the believer an object of worship who is God made man, who condescends to clothe his majesty in sensible form, so that even the humblest may know and love him. Verily it is not surprising that it should have been supposed by some scholars that the author of the "Divine Lay" was acquainted with the New Testament.

ATHANASIUS AND ARIUS.

SIR,—I am sure many of your thoughtful readers must have appreciated Mr. Beeby's essay, and your own editorial comments thereupon. It really seems as though it were now possible to come together "in the unity of the faith, and of the Son of God" without any betrayal of the central verity which, in diverse aspects, we and our liberal orthodox friends have had in trust. Many contemporary utterances point reverent thinkers to the same goal.

Mr. Ruddle's note rather tends to reopen the old controversy; which has, perhaps, taken too much account of the accidents of the long struggle, and the heated arguments of its great protagonists, and too little of the ultimate providential outcome. Says Mr. Joseph Henry Allen (late Harvard Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History): "In the final defeat of the Arian party, Christianity was saved from being a political or speculative sect, and saved to be a great social and reconstructive force,"—and in the same chapter he speaks of "that nondescript illogical compromise known as Arianism." For a robust expression of the same judgment, this time from a learned rabbi in the other camp, one may turn to Professor Knight's "Colloquia Peripatetica," and hear Dr. Duncan: "Arianism is a very meagre patchwork. If we are to be saved, it must be by God or by man. . . But that it should be by one, neither God nor man—not part of both, nor wholly both, and therefore with no real affinity to either of them; that system has no attractions for me." But, do not such representative dicta, equally with pleas like Mr. Ruddle's, illustrate the manifoldness of the religious mind, and the inadequacy of language in its highest flights to embody transcendent truth? Faith and philosophy, the mystical sense and the logical understanding, defining zeal and imaginative licence, will continue to play their parts in the evolution of human belief. The hymn and the prayer will never quite square with the theological statement. Deep calls unto deep in the sanctuary of the soul.

I really took up my pen to recommend any reflective but unlearned disciple who may have been puzzled by Dr. Martineau's quoted words to read the chapter headed "The Way of Historic Christianity" in Dr. Hedge's volume, "Ways of the Spirit"—probably in the chapel library. Dr. Hedge briefly but acutely sums up the "natural history of Church Christology," showing how the four great Councils sifted doctrine, and so cleared the way for reconciliation in the fulness of time. He concludes: "It was well for the Church that this view (the Athanasian) prevailed against the Arian and the monophysite. The Arian saw neither God nor man, nor a God-man, but a hypothetical being who is different from both—an unintelligible ghostly chimera. . . . The Athanasian preserves the humanity intact, leaving me at liberty, as my spiritual wants or mental habits incline, to fasten on the human or divine in the hypostatic union."

Now, if any reader should say, I care nothing for such debates, enough that my New Testament shows me that "God was in Christ," I make not the least demur. O sancta simplicitas! Some things that are hidden from the prudent are still revealed to babes.

THE INDIAN FAMINE.

SIR,—Allow me to inform the liberal donors of the Indian Famine Brahmo-Somaj Fund, through the medium of your journal, that a company of five Brahmos have come to the Nimor district in the Central Provinces for relief work. The arrangements made by the Government of India to relieve the famine-stricken in these parts is excellent. There is, however, urgent necessity of its being supplemented by private agencies.

Our work at Khandwa has been (1) to distribute clothing to the poor who are shockingly ragged; (2) to give doles of grain to the weak and emaciated; (3) to find out and relieve the distressed families who do not come under any section of the Famine Relief Code, and so cannot be relieved by Government officers. A kitchen is going to be opened at Mortakka, a station on the Rajputana Malwa Railway line to-day, to feed the children and helpless old people of the surrounding villages. As the relief work is very defective in the neighbouring villages a large number of famine-stricken people are expected to come here to be fed.

The fund has been a great boon to the country. May God bless the donors.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

SIR,—I see in THE INQUIRER of May 26, in its report of the Committee of the London Domestic Mission, a statement that "the Holly Hill Guild has made a gift to the Mission of £300."

As president of that body may I ask that this may be corrected in your next issue as follows:—"At the initiation of the Holly Hill Guild over £300 has been contributed by old pupils of Mrs. Lalor and Miss Norton (chiefly the former), for the purpose of assistance in the convalescent work of the London Domestic Mission, a small portion only of which has been given for the use of the Bell-street branch for this season."

MINISTERS' CONFERENCE.

SIR,—On behalf of the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting, I have great pleasure in inviting our brother ministers from the provinces to the Ministers' Conference at Essex Hall on the Thursday afternoon in Whitweek at 4 o'clock. An address on "The Christian Minister, as Prophet" will be given by Rev. John Byles, of Northampton, and it is hoped there will be a good gathering of the brethren on the occasion.

OBITUARY.

DR. RADFORD, OF SIDMOUTH.

THE present writer records with deep regret the death of Dr. W. T. Radford, on the 19th inst., at the great age of eighty-nine, having only a few months survived his brother, Mr. J. G. G. Radford, the oldest practising solicitor in England, who died on Dec. 2 last, in the eighty-seventh year of his age. Dr. Radford was born in Exeter, the elder son of Mr. Peter Radford, a well-known physician connected with the Devon and Exeter Hospital in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. The family was at that time connected with the old English Presbyterian congregation at George's Meeting, of which Dr. Lant Carpenter, grandfather of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Oxford, was the honoured minister. The young Radfords were sent to Dr. Carpenter's school, and had among their school-fellows James Heywood, Philip Worsley, T. B. Potter, Kent Kingdon, and others, whose names are well known to the older readers of THE INQUIRER. James Martineau, then fresh from Manchester College, York, was for a year a teacher in the school. As the English Universities were not then open to Nonconformists (Oxford requiring subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles on matriculation, Cambridge on graduating), the Radford brothers were sent to Trinity College, Dublin, which, although under exclusive Church influence, required no subscription. An additional attraction was that their old master, James Martineau, was settled in the year 1828 as junior minister of Eustace-street Chapel, Dublin, and received the two brothers into his house, one of them destined for the legal profession, the elder for the medical. Both brothers retained a life-long veneration and friendship for their old master. One of the first objects that met the visitor's eye on entering their beautiful home at Sidmount was the fine bust of Dr. Martineau, taken, we believe, at about the age of thirty-five. In due course the elder brother took the degree of M.B. at Trinity College, and afterwards proceeded to the M.D. degree. Entering early in life into the possession of a competency he never practised his profession, but devoted himself to the study of Science and Art. Having never married, he took up his abode with his brother's family at Sidmount, near Sidmouth, frequently visiting London, where he became one of the earliest members of the Athenæum Club, and making long journeys on the Continent. He saw most of the capitals of Europe, and nearly all the principal cathedrals, which his extensive knowledge of Art and Architecture enabled him fully to appreciate. Throughout his long life Dr. Radford was a diligent student, continually enriching his mind with stores of learning in various branches of knowledge, and forming one of the best private libraries in the West of England. He had a cultivated taste for Art and Sculpture, and his rooms at Sidmount were crowded with fine paintings and engravings and a rich collection of gems of all kinds, including some exquisite cameos. Dr. Radford was a friend of many notable persons, and his society up to advanced age was much sought on account of his remarkable powers of conversation, and the stately charm of his manner. It is noteworthy that he was always ready to aid and encourage younger students, and showed rare hospitality in placing the new treasures of his library at the disposal of his friends. About thirty years ago Dr. Radford commenced the praiseworthy form of benevolence by which he became extensively known throughout the West of England. Being annoyed, as we learn from a local paper, with the deception practised by itinerant vendors of spectacles and the injury thereby caused to the eyesight of the lace-workers of the district, he made it known that he would give a pair of spectacles to every applicant who was in need of the gift. What was even more important than the gift was that he gave also his professional knowledge, personally saw the applicants and carefully tested their sight. Only a few weeks before his death he informed the present writer that he had given away no less than 32,000 spectacles. In addition to this all public and private appeals of a deserving kind received his generous assistance. He was a munificent supporter of all the local institutions; and the Cottage Hospital, of which the Radford family were the principal founders, the Dispensary, and various county and local societies lose a sincere friend. In politics, Dr. Radford was, like Dr. Martineau, a Liberal of the old school, affirming that the Radicals had deserted the constitutional and moderate principles of the old Whigs, while he had remained unchanged, and, therefore, in sympathy with the Conservatives. In theology, the Radford family ceased more than a generation ago to be connected with the Old Meeting at Sidmouth, which then included in its congregation some of the oldest families in Sidmouth but his mind was essentially open and inquiring, too scientific to embrace the conclusions of dogmatic theory, and although considered a member of the Church of England and a supporter of its charities, he retained to the end the faith of his early life, modified by his candid reception of the most advanced scientific thought and Biblical criticism of his time. The present writer has lost a friend whose noble personality brightened the comparative seclusion of his life. It is a melancholy consolation that the end was peaceful and painless—the gradual decay of honoured old age.

Of no distemper, of no blast he died,
But fell like autumn fruit that mellowed long,
E'en wondered at because he dropped no sooner.
Fate seemed to wind him up to four score years,
But freshly ran he on nine winters more,
Till like a clock worn out by eating Time,
The wheels of weary life at last stood still.

CHARLES EDWARD PINNOCK.

AFTER a long and painful illness, endured very patiently, Mr. Charles E. Pinnock passed away on Sunday, May 20. Following in the footsteps of his father, he gave much of his time to public work, and secured the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens in the Isle of Wight. He entered the ancient Corporation of Newport, the town of his birth, and accepted its highest office in 1898. In this position he gave great satisfaction, and it is acknowledged that he fully maintained its best traditions, though during the period of his mayoralty the malady from which he died caused him at times severe pain and discomfort. He was the first chairman of the Cowes Harbour Commissioners, and also served as county alderman. The Unitarian congregation in Newport, of which he was the treasurer, will long feel his loss, and his death causes a vacancy on the Council of the B. and F.U.A.

The funeral on Friday, May 25, was conducted by the Revs. W. J. Jupp, and C. E. Pike, at the beautiful Carisbrooke cemetery. There was a very large attendance, including the Mayor and Corporation of Newport, the Albany Lodge of Freemasons, and other public bodies. The hymn, "When the day of toil is done," was sung at the grave, and the bright May sunshine seemed a symbol of the "Light for evermore."

MRS. ALFRED KNOWLES.

MANY friends in the Manchester district will hear with deep regret of the death of Mrs. Sarah Ann Knowles, which took place on Sunday, May 20, at her house, North Bank, Sale. She was the widow of Mr. Alfred Knowles, the cotton spinner, and was the daughter of Mr. J. Jackson, a Manchester tradesman, and a staunch supporter of Stangeways Chapel in its early days. For over thirty years Mrs. Knowles had been a member of the congregation, at Sale in the Sunday-school of which she took a special interest, assisting till infirmity prevented her more active work in the duties of the classes. She had always been a liberal supporter of the chapel, contributing handsomely to the new building when that was erected some twenty-three years ago, and also to the fund raised three years ago to rebuild the chapel after the destructive fire. Many of our denominational institutions will lose in her a liberal supporter. Her great kindness of heart and thoughtful care for the troubles of others will cause her to be much missed by a large circle of friends. We understand that she has left a bequest for the benefit of the Sale Chapel, and also to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, in the work of which she always took the greatest interest.

SOME INTERESTING STATISTICS.

WE are indebted to a correspondent for the following interesting notes gathered from the recently issued report of the Registrar-General for the year 1898:—

From this report it appears that the number of marriages celebrated during the year was 255,379, being the greatest number on record. Each of the three prior years had exceeded all their predecessors, and the marriage rate rose in 1898 to 16·3 per 1,000 persons, being higher than in any year since 1876. Of these marriages 174,826 were Church of England marriages, the greatest number ever recorded, but at the same time the proportion was the smallest—namely, 685 per 1,000, being one less than in the previous year. This drop of 1 per 1,000 may not seem to be very material, but it is a step in a process which has been going on almost continuously since the present marriage law was settled in 1848. In 1849 the Church marriages were 868 per 1,000, so that the drop in half a century has been 180 per 1,000. Of other marriages 10,164 were Roman Catholic, being again the greatest number ever recorded, but the proportion was on a par with the lowest—namely, 40 per 1,000, a figure only previously touched in years when there were strikes or distress in the northern counties, where Roman Catholics are most numerous. The boast often uttered by Roman Catholics that they are rapidly increasing in this country is not borne out by the marriage statistics. In 1853 their marriages were 51 per 1,000, and for some fifteen years thereafter they averaged about 47. In 1898 they stood at 40, and in the three previous years at 41. It is clear that the number of Roman Catholics in the country has not increased at anything like the same rate as the rest of the population. Indeed, having regard to the extension of facilities for marrying according to their own rites, it may be doubted whether their number has increased at all.

The Protestant Nonconformist marriages in 1898 were 30,900, being the highest number ever recorded, and the proportion also was the greatest ever recorded—namely, 121 per 1,000. The proportion has risen steadily from 61 per 1,000 in 1849, to the present figure which it reached in 1897, and maintained in 1898.

Jewish marriages were 1,445 in number, and 5·7 per 1,000, the number being the greatest on record, and the proportion on a par with the greatest; Jewish marriages stood at 1·6 per 1,000 in 1849, and have gradually risen to 5·7 in 1897 and 1898, the rise being the most marked during the last fifteen years, and being doubtless caused to some extent by immigration.

Civil marriages were 37,938 in number and 148 per 1,000, the number being the greatest ever recorded, and the proportion having been only once before attained—namely, in 1894, after which year it had dropped to 147 in 1895, and 146 in 1896 and 1897. In 1849 the proportion of civil marriages was only 49 per 1,000, but from that date to the present it has shown an almost uninterrupted increase.

Thus the marriage statistics show that during the last half century there has been a very decided defection of members from the older Christian Churches, and an increase of Protestant Nonconformists and of persons who prefer not attaching themselves to any Church at all. The older Churches are accustomed to represent themselves as the guardians of culture and morality, and sometimes predict that any diminution of their influence must necessarily be followed by a lapse into barbarism and vice and crime. It will be worth while inquiring whether this claim is in any way borne out by the report before us.

First, then, we find that the number of men who were unable to write their names in the marriage register book, fell from 310 per 1,000 in 1849 to 31 per 1,000 in 1898, and in the same period the number of women under the same disability fell from 459 to 36 per 1,000. Education, therefore, has clearly advanced, and another table shows us that the number of paupers has declined from 62 per 1,000 in 1849 to 23 in 1898, although the last mentioned figure is not quite as low as in 1891 and 1892, when it stood at 22·8 and 22·7 respectively. We know, also, from other quarters that the judicial statistics show a marked diminution of crime during the last 50 years, so that altogether we may be satisfied that in this country progress is being made both in intelligence and rectitude of conduct, and there are beneficent and uplifting influences at work which will remain, even though in the coming century a further decline in the influence of the older Churches should have to be chronicled.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Martineau's "Hours of Thought."

The Witness of God with our Spirit.

THE scepticism which men affect towards their higher inspirations is often not an honest doubt, but a guilty negligence; and is always a sign of narrow mind and defective wisdom. Who ever found that the heavy mood in which he could admire nothing, be touched by nothing, sanctify nothing, permanently proved the true one? Who, when once he has escaped it, does not know this leaden look and solid air upon the surface of life to be the brooding cloud of his own heart? and how often do the more luminous perceptions of other souls reveal to us, in nature, in art, in character, a beauty we had not discerned before, but which is no sooner shown than it startles us by its reality out of all denial! Left to ourselves to peer about from the dull prison of our grosser mind,—unaided by the mighty spirits of our race, who emancipate us by their greatness and snatch us by their genius into the free light,—how little should we see of the sanctity and glory of this world! What a dim and subterranean life we should live! Yet the instant we are taken aloft we find that the darkness was the dream and the splendour is come true! If you will believe only in the perceptions of sense, and distrust the intimations of the spirit, it is a question how low you will descend for your test of certainty. Will you depend upon your own faculties in proportion as they are simply animal, and deny them in proportion as they are divine?—confide in your eyesight and give the lie to the conscience and affections? The herds that low amid the Alpine echoes have, no less than you, the outline of the everlasting hills, and the verdure of the pine-cleared slope, painted on their vision, and the chant of the distant torrent swelling and fainting on their ear: is their perception truer,—are they nearer to reality, because they cannot, with you, meet the sublime gaze of nature and see through to the eternity of God? The grandeur and the glory that you behold, are they not there? the divine expressiveness, the speaking appeal to your silent worship, the mingling of something secret with your spirit, as if unseen thought were flowing from the mountains and the sky, to meet the answering radiation of your soul,—are these, which are the human privilege, a phantom of unreality,—a delusion which the fortunate brutes escape? It is impossible! Call it imagination, call it wonder, call it love, whatever it be that shows us the deeper significance of the world and humanity and makes the difference between the surface-light of sagacity and the interpenetrating glow of worship, we owe to it whatever highest truth, whatever trustiest guidance we have. Wherever there is anything beautiful to read, anything holy, anything tender and profound, this alone avails and commands the key of true interpretation. The hard and literal mind mistakes everything in proportion as its import is of priceless worth; misses, beyond all others, the drift of human language, still more the silent expression of look and action, and gropes without apprehension through the blessed hieroglyphics of life and nature. Does not the poet, does not the prophet, ask for a reader with enthusiasm enough to appreciate him, and complain that by others he is not understood? If the greatest human works and utterances demand for their apprehension a soul kindled with intense affections, can we doubt what is the qualification, and what the disqualification, for reading the Divine? May not their Author,—Soul of our souls, who breathes the eternal poem of the universe, and attunes our minds to hear it, who provides at once the hymn of the morning stars that sing together and the chords of the spirit that tremble to their strain, ask as clear a response from us as we demand from one another?

When, therefore, in higher moments brought by the sorrows of life, the tension of duty, or the silence of thought, you catch some faint tones of a voice diviner than your own, know that you are not alone, and who it is that is with you. Stay not in the cold monologue of solitary meditation, but fling yourself into the communion of prayer. Fold not the personal shadows round you; lie open to the gleam that pierces them; confide in it as the brightest of realities,—a path of heavenly light streaking the troubled waters of your being, and leading your eye to the orb that sends it. Learn to distrust the suggestions of lower and more earthly hours, and scatter the fears of the slothful, unawakened heart. If we treat the very "light that is in us as darkness, how great is that darkness!" Be it ours to doubt the glooms, and not the glory of our souls; to lie low beneath the blinding cloud, and simply cry, "Lord, that I may receive my sight!" and rise up to prophesy, only when the heavens are opened, and the divinest scope of things is clear; to court, and not to shun, the bursts of holy suspicion that break through the crust of habit and the films of care, and accept them as a glance from the eye of the Infinite,—the "witness of his Spirit with our spirit, that we are the children of God."

Robin Redbreast's Corn: A Legend of Brittany.

ST. LEONORE was a Welsh preacher, and he lived about the same time as St. David and St. Patrick, whom the Welsh and Irish still love to remember. The English from across the North Sea had conquered Britain, re-named it Angle-land, or England, and had driven those Celts or Britons whom they did not kill or keep as slaves into the west of our island, and into Brittany in the north-west of France. Many of the Britons were Christians. There were British churches for the worship of God, and there were men so much wiser and better than other folks, and so eager to teach the heathen, Britons and English, that men named them saints.

St. Leonore was one of these, who, with a number of followers, crossed the sea from this country to Brittany to preach the Gospel to the people there. They made their way through terrible forests and dreary wastes, over hill and dale, carrying their message of Christian love wherever two or three could be gathered together. At last they settled down in a rude monastery in a valley of moorland, and thatched their wattled cells with fern, and built a rustic chapel with moss-covered stones; built also a byre for their cattle, and drained the swampy ground, praying ever as they laboured. Then they ploughed the land. But alas! they had no grain wherewith to sow it!

Said the Bishop, "God will help us,
In the hour of bitter loss."
Then one spied a robin redbreast
Sitting on a wayside cross.
Doubtless came the bird to answer
To the words the monk did speak,
For, a heavy wheat-ear dangled,
From the robin's polished beak.
Then the brothers as he dropped it
Picked it up, and careful sowed,
And abundantly in autumn
Reaped the harvest where they strowed.

And in Brittany "Robin Redbreast's Corn" is still the saying for "small beginnings that prosper."

This pretty legend teaches us, first, not to despise little beginnings if they are good; and secondly, to persevere in our good undertakings. Yes, everything depends on the right start, and then all depends on the patience, zeal, and love with which we continue straight away to the end. It is God's way of working, this reaching from small things to great results, in the world of rocks, plants and animals, and in the lives of men, women and children. During this glorious springtime we see many small beginnings that God thinks very good, and will prosper if the laws of His wise Providence are kept: the leaves that have just burst from their little brown silken sheaths, and that will soon feed and shelter the plant and make pleasant shade for us; the crozier-like fronds of the ferns that will open out in sun and rain and erelong carry the seeds of future ferns upon their backs; the tender green blades of wheat that will help to guide the rain to the roots of the corn-stalks, and so swell the ripening ears; the first two shoots of the bracken that look like a pair of wings flying over the dusky moorlands, and that will in a short time grow higher than your head and shelter many a wild bird and animal; the two seed leaves of young sycamores like emerald butterflies resting at the roots of forest-trees that were once tiny seedlings too; baby fir-trees with leaves more like threads than needles with dainty brown stems, which will some day be hardened into the stiff ruddy trunks of full-grown stately pines, that may delight our eyes in a sunset glow, or be cut down for masts of mighty ships. What a dull, if not useless world it would be if God did not think it worth while to make these little beginnings, and provide means for them to grow to some purpose.

And your lives, children, are full of small good beginnings, that will prosper if you forget and leave off the bad ones. Beginnings of clean and tidy habits to make your bodies strong, of quick and noble thinking, of obedience to the voice of conscience, beginnings of the feeling that God has given each a soul, a character, which He has given no one else, and that He means you, with all your powers, to do something in the world to help Him, the beginning of the making up your mind to work and be your best, whatever God gives you to do, whether it is exactly what you like and expect or not, or whether you quite understand what God means it for.

Why, if you come to think of it, the beginning is the most important part of anything we do. What chance is there of finding the correct answer to a sum if you do not begin by copying the question down correctly, and working with right reasoning, and tidy unmistakeable figures from the first? What sort of a sock would a girl knit if she did not cast on her needles the exact number of stitches wanted, and count her rows carefully, and drop no stitches from the very first row?

And do not let us forget the second lesson of "Robin Redbreast's Corn," that when we have begun rightly we must persevere to the end. It is so easy to keep good resolution on New Year's Day, or the day after, or on your birthday, or on Sundays, or once and twice in the week when you happen to remember. That, however, is being good by spurts, and every boy and girl knows that no race was ever won by spurts, except, perhaps, by the last little one at the goal, but by steady "best pace in the long run." So those monks did not stop at that first year's harvest, and St. Leonore was not content with his one rude monastery, and the first few churches here and there about Brittany.

Do you mark the waving glory
O'er the Breton hill slope flung?
All that wealth from robin redbreast's
Little ear of wheat has sprung.
Do you mark the many churches
Scattered o'er that pleasant land?
All results are of the preaching
Of that venerable band.
Therefore, Christian, small beginnings
Pass not by with looks of scorn.
God may prosper them as prospered
Robin redbreast's ear of corn.

All the while I have been telling you this legend of Brittany I have thought of St. Paul's famous words (you will find them near the end of his letter to the Galatians in your New Testaments), "Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." It would be helpful if you learnt that sentence by heart, and said it to yourselves when you felt slack over lessons, or other work, over home-duties, and play. I know a little boy who tried that plan, especially over his Latin, which he hated, and which his mother had to talk seriously to him about many times. He is really mastering it now, and actually likes his Latin, and, more than that, has learnt the good of hard work and perseverance.

So we can all come to know how good it is to be faithful in little things, trying to correct little faults, to do little deeds of love, to know little lessons of patience; and these "small beginnings" God will surely prosper as the "Robin Redbreast's Corn."

WHAT THE SPIRIT SAITH.

WHITSUNTIDE reminds us always of the new birth of spiritual life, which came to the disciples in the first days of the Christian Church after the Master had been taken from their sight, bringing to them new vision of the things unseen, a deep conviction of love and life beyond the power of death, and a joyful energy of faith, which overcame the world. And for us it recalls the memory not only of that first great baptism of the Spirit, but of the continuous testimony of the world's growing spiritual life and its greatest achievements throughout the centuries, of man lifted above the meaner things of earth, of which the lower self is the meanest, quickened repeatedly to new energy of faith and self-devotion, made conscious of the Divine presence, wakened to new enterprise and aspiration in the knowledge and the strength and joy of a Divine calling. So we find a constant witness to the renewal of a deeper life, and it bids us not to be content with memories of the past, however beautiful and inspiring they may be, but to turn our faces to the light of the new day and to ask whether we can be content with our present achievements and the present standard of our duties, or whether there might not come to us also some fresh outpouring of the Spirit, that should lift us into a new world of victorious faith and enable us to render some better service for the Kingdom of GOD. What may be in store for us we cannot say, but we do know that such gifts of fuller life come only to those who reverently and faithfully set themselves to be obedient to the Spirit teaching inwardly, following the guidance of the most intimate pleadings of truth and righteousness and pure, unselfish love.

There are many ways in which the appeal may come home to us and our churches, that we should bear a clearer testimony to the truth of our life with GOD and to the power of a sincere brotherhood. It is to one of these that we desire at the moment to call special attention. In our great cities we are brought face to face with masses of poverty and suffering and vice, the utter dreariness and terrible nature of which very few of us fully realise. What has our religion to say to this—what is it doing to meet the urgent appeals of duty which this involves? The good citizen, the economist, the philanthropist, each has a duty in the matter. In our Domestic Missions we have sought to come near to these darker regions of our common life with the ministry of direct personal sympathy and manifold helpfulness.

Ministers are specially devoted to this work as friends of the neglected poor, and many helpers are gathered round them at the various Missions to sustain their efforts, and to share with those whose need is greatest the gifts of their richer and more beautiful life. But the need is so great and the support of the work from various causes so apt to fall away, while all the time it ought rather to be immeasurably increased, that the voice of pleading can never long be silent, asking for fresh helpers and more abundant means. Some little time ago we called attention to the necessities of the Manchester Domestic Mission, in our present issue will be found the appeal of the Rev. Dr. KLEIN for the Liverpool Missions, and last week we published a report of the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission, which forcibly illustrated some of the chief aspects of the work. Further to bring home a sense of the great need, we will quote here some passages from the Report of the Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, of the Bell-street Mission, in Marylebone:—

It is not easy to give a description of a year's work with all its hopes and fears, its aims and partial fulfilment, in the short pages of a report. In the detailed account that follows attention will be directed chiefly to the various engagements that make our Hall, especially in the winter evenings, a scene of constant and changing activity. But the time spent there is only an index of the time spent in the streets and in the homes of the people. What I learn of the wants of the poor by frequent intercourse with them, I try to provide for when we gather together in worship, in social intercourse, in recreation or in lecture-room. What is done is, of course, inadequate, for no minister can apply any radical cure to the misery from which the dwellers in a slum suffer. This I should describe as a general negation of comfort, a privation of the elements of material well-being. There is a great deal of sickness in our district, but the general lack of vitality is perhaps even more serious. Men, and more especially women, habitually go about their work when every effort is a weariness. If under these circumstances the home is not always well kept I do not wonder, but, rather, admire the dull heroism of the large number who do keep it orderly and clean. Actual hunger may be occasional, but lack of nourishment is common. An amount of food that will still hunger is usually forthcoming—nourishment sufficient to support a healthy body is too often lacking. Hence the prevalence of anæmia and its train of attendant diseases; hence, too, the numerous ailing and ricketty children and those tending to epilepsy. Some of these ills may be traced to a vicious heredity, but even then are usually aggravated by innutrition. Many of the poor are quite aware of the advantage of buying good boots, but economic pressure forces them to wear the cheapest. These are stiff, uncomfortable, and harmful to the feet, so that walking becomes a painful effort. One case of flat-foot, so severe that the man had to give up work, has recently come to my knowledge. But it is the rule for boots to be so bad as to prevent ease in walking and cause a slow gait that approaches more or less nearly to lameness. The power to purchase even these cheap boots is so small that women often have to stay indoors during wet weather, or at least to wait until the husband returns from work that they may go out in his boots! What is true of food and clothing is also true of the houses. One or two small rooms, sometimes in the case of large families three rooms, must suffice for all the home life, for nursery, kitchen, sitting-room, bedroom, and, at least, for a large part of the year, for drying-ground also. Here, too, in this crowded space the solemn processes of birth and death must be enacted. The number of one-room tenements is very large. The inmates of these last may usually retain their modesty, but they are quite robbed of home comfort. The passages, staircases, and often the rooms are dark, so that for many months in the year the light is never more than a gloom.

Such are some of the ordinary privations of the honest working poor. They call for large measures of social reconstruction based on the faith that the health of the people is the first concern of the Commonwealth. I can only note this economic evil and record my admiration for the many whom I know living this hard life and doing with immense patience their daily duty amidst the most hopeless surroundings. It is through visiting the poor in their homes that one's sense of pity and indignation is broadened and educated. This burden of poverty is not necessary, and ought not to be placed on the shoulders of the world's workers.

In face of such conditions the missionaries and their helpers labour with patient faithfulness to educate the children and young people and to shield them as far as possible from vicious influences, to alleviate the sufferings of the sick, the aged and the helpless, to give fresh strength to bear heavy burdens and a better wisdom to face hard conditions, and to brighten the lives of young and old alike and enrich them with new and varied interests. How essential a part healthy recreation plays in such work, Mr. GRAY indicates in the following further passage of his Report:—

I would draw attention to the large provision that is made for recreative social intercourse. The gathering for enjoyment is a communion of human beings in which so much soul-power as each possesses will have its influence in creating the spiritual atmosphere, and this not the less because it rarely finds didactic expression. Now one, now another, who has come for amusement or instruction has found himself or herself impelled to render service. The conviction that mutual enjoyment requires and implies mutual helpfulness has been growing during this year. In some it has come to a full self-consciousness; it is leading others to cast about for some good work to do. An important part of the work of the Mothers' Meeting is now being done by the members themselves; before long I hope to recruit the Sunday-school teaching staff from those who a year ago sought only to be amused. In these and many ways I am met by a desire to be helpful. This is the sentiment I have tried to foster, the lesson which I have believed a bright and healthful social intercourse would teach. So far as this helpful spirit has grown among us, it is to be regarded as the chief and happiest result of the year's work.

Such is the work which our churches in London, in Liverpool, in Manchester, and other great centres of population, are called upon to support. We could wish very earnestly that the reading of such a report as Mr. GRAY'S might lead some other of our young people to go down to help; it shows how varied and often how simple are the ways of helpfulness; what is required is honest sympathy and an unselfish desire to be of use; and then there is no gift that cannot be put to some good service, with benefit not less to the giver than to those who receive. Personal service, in one or other of the many open ways, is the greatest help, and they who render it are not only conferring and receiving an immediate benefit in the kindling of sympathy and the enriching of social life, but they more than any others are coming face to face with the most pressing problems of our time, seeing what are the real facts of poverty in city life, and helping to generate that force of public opinion, based upon sound knowledge, which must at last make an end of the disgraceful conditions in which so many of our brothers and sisters are now compelled to live. But those who cannot render any personal service ought none the less to acquaint themselves with the facts, and at least should be familiar with the Missionaries' reports. Having done so, they surely will not disregard the appeal for an adequate maintenance of such work.

If it is asked whence shall come upon us and our churches a new baptism of the Spirit, can we say that there is any other way so sure as this, that we make our Brotherhood and our faith in Eternal Goodness effective in the poorest and most desolate quarters of our great cities? There can hardly be a test of the vitality of our churches more searching than this, whether we neglect or sustain by personal service and abundant gifts their ministry to the poor; there can hardly be a promise of richer, fuller life more sure than this, that they are willing in CHRIST'S spirit to give their life to such love and service.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

JUBILEE MEETING.

THE fiftieth annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Thursday evening, May 24, the President, Sir J. T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P., in the chair. The meeting was largely attended, and an hour was spent, before the chair was taken, in pleasant social intercourse.

Letters of regret were received from the secretary of the Highgate congregation and the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, who, with other of their members, were unable to be present in consequence of a congregational meeting; also from the Rev. F. W. Stanley, the newly-appointed minister at Brixton.

The Rev. J. E. STRONGE read the Committee's Report:—

The Report having noted that the Society had completed fifty years of activity, gave the following particulars as to its foundation and progress. The idea originated in a desire among the younger members of our London congregations to spread abroad those principles of Unitarian Christianity which were dear to their hearts and which satisfied the spiritual needs of their souls. The first steps were taken early in 1850, the cordial support of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was given, and on May 2, in that year, the first General Meeting of Subscribers was held at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars. During the first ten years of the Society's existence the work was chiefly carried on by means of theological lectures delivered in various parts of London and the suburbs, by holding quarterly meetings at which theological subjects were discussed, and by the establishment of a shop for the sale of Unitarian books and pamphlets.

In 1860 a new departure was made, and the Society extended its operations to missionary enterprise. Help was given to one of our oldest Churches which had encountered great difficulties. The congregation was provided with the services of the Rev. Robert Spears, who for many years acted as the Society's Missionary Minister, both there and among the East-end Churches; and a beginning thus made in the work of sustaining and supporting our less prosperous Churches.

In spite of an extremely limited income from annual subscriptions, the Society was able during the first twenty years to found churches at Stepney, Peckham, Clerkenwell, and Woolwich, and to assist several of the older foundations, while among more recently founded churches which owe their existence to a greater or less degree to the efforts of the Society may be mentioned Bermondsey, Forest Gate, Kilburn, Lewisham, Richmond, Plumstead, Wandsworth, and Wood Green.

In 1857 the Society published a list of the Unitarian and Free Churches then existing in the Metropolitan district, which furnishes interesting evidence of our progress. From this list it appears that the Society could then only count upon a constituency of some sixteen places of worship, including three General Baptist Chapels and two mission stations, while in the year 1900 there are thirty places of worship in the Metropolitan district belonging to our household of faith.

It is a subject of legitimate gratification to your Society that in the past fifty years it has been instrumental in establishing so many centres of enlightened Christian worship. The work has been done in spite of great difficulties, and the success attained could only have been achieved by the self-denying labours and earnest zeal of the devoted men who guided the work of the Society.

The Report then referred to the undertaking begun in the Autumn of 1897, on the initiative of Dr. Blake Odgers, to celebrate the Jubilee of the Society by raising a Permanent Church Building Fund, an undertaking achieved largely through donations, but completed by the great success of the recent Bazaar. Before the Bazaar opened donations amounted to over £10,000, and the net profits would bring the total (as the treasurer subsequently stated) in all probability to £13,000. To Dr. and Mrs. Odgers, and to all helpers in that great effort, the heartiest thanks were accorded.

The work of the Committee during the year had been concentrated chiefly on the strengthening and encouraging of the assisted churches, and the ministers of those churches were invited to quarterly Conferences with the Committee to take counsel as to their work. Particulars were given as to the churches at Bermondsey, Lewisham, Plumstead, Kentish Town, Kilburn, Forest Gate, Stepney and Stratford, Mansford-street, and the Elsa-street Mission, Limehouse. Good progress was reported at most of these centres, and especially at Kilburn and Kentish Town, which promised soon to be independent of the Society, and had each furnished a separate stall at the Bazaar. At Bermondsey the scheme referred to at the last annual meeting had not been carried to a successful issue, and the Rev. H. Rylett had resigned the pulpit. Since the death of the Rev. R. Spears the Committee, at Miss Durning Smith's request, had undertaken the supervision of the Limehouse Mission; they had also taken a sympathetic interest in the Welsh services held at Essex Hall. Having recorded the losses sustained through the death of valued supporters during the year, and made special reference to the death of Dr. Martineau, the Report dealt with the financial position of the Society.

Grants in aid of seven churches had been slightly larger than in 1898, being £814 15s. 6d. against £807 5s. 6d., but no grants had to be made for Chapel repairs or against Chapel deficiencies, which amounted in 1898 to £118 7s. 10d.; the remaining expenditure in 1899 had been £11 10s. 11d. higher than in 1898. Subscriptions (chiefly owing to deaths) had fallen off £8 5s. 6d., donations by £2 10s.; the balance of Mr. Tayler's appeal came to £51 1s.; a handsome donation from one friend of £100, and a legacy from the late Mr. T. Bentley of £100, less duty, produced £190, materially reducing what promised at one time to be a heavy deficit to £210 11s., and this had since been further reduced by a donation of £100 from the President. Eight congregations had made collections for the Society, and an appeal was made both for collections in other churches and for further subscriptions, that the increasing claims of work might be adequately met.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, in presenting the treasurer's statement, said that he need not repeat the particulars embodied in the report of the Committee. The subscription list, which in 1897 stood at £270, had steadily declined, being last year only £247 16s., and the income was quite inadequate to the demands of their work. They had been faced by a very serious deficiency, but, thanks to the special effort of Mr. Tayler, their late president, and opportune donations and a legacy, the balance due to the treasurer, which at the beginning of the year had been £229 10s. 3d., was at the close only £210 11s. It was essential that they should obtain a sufficient subscription list if their expenditure was not to be cut down, which would mean failing to meet some of the claims of their work. He urged that the present subscribers should individually interest other members of their congregations and thus obtain fresh support. It was to be noted that the new fund would not directly enrich that society, though it would relieve some of their aided churches of present debts. He hoped that the lecturing, which had been so successful a part of their work in former years would not be neglected, as even where there was no thought of forming a new congregation, good seed was sown, which often bore fruit elsewhere.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report, referred to the fact that that was their Jubilee Meeting, and said that while the report had not told them that their Society was now younger than ever, he should look forward to finding at its Diamond Jubilee than it was more enterprising and younger that on that occasion. The report had been very pleasant to listen to, and especially the statement of the increase in number of their congregations during thirty years from sixteen to thirty. Nothing pleased him better than to hear that Unitarian principles were uttered, enforced, listened to, and adopted. They ought no longer to be satisfied with the boast that a great many Unitarians went to the Church of England, he would rather they should say that a great many more went to Unitarian churches. They had to record losses every year, and the fact that those new churches brought in recruits, and as a rule young people, was very satisfactory, and he hoped it would go on. He emphasised what Mr. Martineau had said as to the value of lectures, and recalled what he had heard from his father of the benefit derived by their churches in Liverpool sixty years ago from such lectures. Having alluded to the list of distinguished names of friends removed by death, and especially to that of Dr. Martineau, he spoke of the very appreciative eulogium on the character and influence of Dr. Martineau in the speech made by Bishop Welldon at Calcutta. But one passage in the speech had rather jarred upon him, that in which Dr. Martineau was said to have expressed his satisfaction that in the controversy between Athanasius and Arius the views of Athanasius had prevailed in the Church. He had consulted a number of those who were familiar with Dr. Martineau's writings, and from all that he had heard lately and through a number of years, it seemed to him that there must have been some mistake, and that Dr. Martineau cannot have made such a statement. In conclusion, he said that teaching which had produced in the past those noble men and women could not fail to produce a long and noble succession to them.

Mr. J. T. PRESTON seconded the motion, and speaking as a surviving member of the original committee, referred to a number of old friends connected with the foundation of that Society, and particularly to the late Sir James Clarke Lawrence. There had been at the outset some measure of suspicion and doubt on the part of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, but that very soon passed away, the Association acted nobly towards them, and their Society had materially assisted the work which the Association had at heart. Mistakes had doubtless been made, but they had done good work for the Unitarian body.

The resolution having been unanimously adopted, Mr. FRANK PRESTON, as treasurer of the Jubilee Fund, made a statement as to the result of the Bazaar. While regretting that Mr. Nettlefold, their senior treasurer, was not present to make the statement, he had peculiar satisfaction in taking part in that Jubilee meeting, as his father was one of the original committee. Donations at the time of the opening of the Bazaar had amounted to £10,198 11s. 3d., receipts from the Bazaar amounted to £2,974 7s. 7d., making a total, with some further additions, of £13,278 11s. 3d.; expenses had amounted to £538 8s. 6d., so that the net result was £12,740 2s. 9d. But there was still more to come in from several sources, and he had no doubt that in the end there would be £13,000 available for the purposes of the Fund. Particulars as to the various stalls he reserved for the completed report, which would be issued; but he mentioned that while Essex Church stood first, it was particularly notable that Kentish Town, which a few years ago had been so largely dependent on their Society, had raised £280 16s. 8d., and Kilburn, another of the aided churches, £120 19s. 2½d.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER then moved a resolution congratulating the Society on the completion of its fifty years of useful work, and having been instrumental in establishing the Church Building Fund, and expressing the wish that it might long continue its labours for the promotion of liberal religious thought. He spoke, not like Mr. Preston, as a member of the original Committee, and yet as one who was from the first actively connected with the Society. While valuable work had been done in the past, he thought the fire and enthusiasm shown by those who had carried through the great effort of the Bazaar was equal to anything they had seen in former years. When the Society was founded there was a great lack of cohesion among their churches, and congregations such as Hampstead, which were now large and vigorous, were then extremely small. The only large congregations then were that in Essex-street Chapel, and Mr. Fox's at South-place. Their work was rather under-estimated in the report, for Croydon was not mentioned, which had originated from efforts of their Society. Some of the old London churches had been lost, but many of those who had moved from the old centres had been gathered into the new churches in outlying districts. The days of controversy over creeds had to some extent gone by, and the Press partly did that work. It was for them now to take the simple form of Christianity expressed in the New Testament, "Love one another," and to declare that to the world. There was no place where it was more needed than in London, where greed, ambition, selfishness, and vice of many kinds had to be resisted. Christian churches were the one remedy that would bring people to a better condition of life. Each of their churches would help towards that great end, and the new fund, on which he congratulated them, would be a material assistance. So their Unitarian Christianity would produce more fruitful results, bring light into the lives of their fellowmen, preventing the evil of slums, resisting the oppression working-men had to contend with, which was often a condition of semi-slavery. There was only one remedy: they must get at the moral life of those who had the control. There was a vast work to be done, for something deeper than creed, for brotherhood. They looked back on fifty years of good work, but there was a heavier task for the next fifty years.

Sir E. DURNING-LAWRENCE, Bart., M.P., in seconding the motion, referred to his presence as a boy at the inaugural meeting, and said that people nowadays did not realise the position of Unitarians fifty years ago. For his own part it had been his constant aim to show respect to dissenters, even to the humblest of them, and to help them to the recognition and the equality which was their due. He quoted a passage from Macaulay, to the effect that vice and misery were not increasing among them, but their eyes were increasingly opened to see the vice that existed; so in the present time they felt their duties more keenly and recognised the call to more faithful service.

Dr. BROOKE HERFORD supported the resolution, and said that he had enjoyed many of the retrospects of that evening, for they carried him back to the time when he was just completing his College course, and preparing to take his place in the work of their churches. Every good new movement helped to strengthen and hearten the others. Nothing had more helped and strengthened their work throughout the country than those district associations which arose about that time. Not one of them but had a similar story to tell of good work done; but they were all alike in not having half enough support. They had been bitten all through those fifty years with the vice of unsectarianism; they were so dreadfully afraid of doing injustice to the views of others that they had only succeeded in doing injustice to their own, by defect of statement, and failing to let the world know what they thought and why they thought it. But they had got over that a good deal; and some of those who had seemed to discourage that kind of movement, had helped more than they knew. Dr. Martineau had not taken much part in the work of District Unitarian Societies, but nothing could prevent him from being known as the leading Unitarian. That had been their strength, and it would last for many years to come. On that anniversary he could not help remembering the man who through a good part of those years was one of the strongest forces of their good work in London—the Rev. Robert Spears. To him they owed a great deal of the distinctness of their work and voice, and the heartening influence which stimulated and kept them together. They were now at the end of fifty years, and had been spending from eight to nine hundred a year on an income of £250, an amount of work enough to fill one with trembling joy on the income of a small country congregation. It was work heartily to be thankful for; and what they had achieved by the Bazaar, the greatness of which they could not as yet fully realise, would give them new spirit and strength for the work of the next half-century. They must go right on, doing the work that lay before them, and always doing it in the best way they could.

The resolution having been passed, Mr. PERCY PRESTON proposed, and the Rev. W. C. POPE seconded, the appointment of the officers, with Sir John Brunner as President.

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS moved, and Mr.

CLARK seconded, the appointment of the Committee, and the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Harold Bailey for his services as secretary, and to Messrs. Cooper and Noel, retiring members of the Committee. Dr. ODGERS pointed out that no ladies were proposed on the Committee, which in view of the admirable work they had done, especially in connection with the Bazaar, seemed to him an omission. He also added a warm expression of their indebtedness to the Rev. T. M. Edwards, for his services as organising secretary to the Bazaar. To him its great success was largely due.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. H. B. Lawford, and seconded by Mr. J. Sudbery, brought the meeting to a close.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

COLLECTIONS were made at the Ullet-road Church last Sunday in aid of the Liverpool Domestic Missions, and at the morning service a special sermon was preached by the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein. Taking as his text Deuteronomy xv. 2, "The poor shall never cease out of the land; therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land," Dr. Klein said: When Jesus said to his disciples "The poor ye have with you always," he may have been quoting to them this well-known passage of the Book of the Law, "The poor shall never cease out of the land." But in the Book of Deuteronomy this thought, so sadly true at all times of the world's history, is put before us in a practical way as one that should be faced and seriously grappled with, not to be simply stated with barren feelings and useless regret. The Hebrew legislator, speaking in the name of his God, and, as he believes, under the influence of His spirit, does not enter into the question of the causes of pauperism. Whether it be an inevitable consequence of the laws affecting the distribution of wealth in human societies, or whether it be the necessary effect of the great yet dangerous gift of free will to man, the sacred writer does not say. Given the fact, he simply states the law, and the law is that, in virtue of the solidarity of human brotherhood, we have, each one of us, a duty incumbent upon us—namely, to contribute towards the possible elimination of suffering among men, to help in diminishing the sum of pain, poverty, and sorrow implied in the upward struggle of the race. "Therefore, I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land."

To say that the poor shall never cease out of the land, or that we have the poor always with us, will appear to many, perhaps, as a simple truism. But the saying is much more than that; for, granted that we have the poor always with us—that is, that the problem of poverty can never be altogether eliminated from the list of social questions, it follows that we have no excuse for treating the problem of poverty as one to be dealt with when it presses too acutely upon us, and to be left alone at other times. Precisely because the poor are always with us are we bound to organise permanent means for dealing with the permanent difficulty. The Jewish legislation from which we have quoted was, locally at least, a wise and practical attempt to deal regularly with the problem of poverty within Israel, and it contrasts favourably with some of the spasmodic, hesitating attempts which have been made even in our times in the same direction.

The needs of the poor are manifold—needs of the body, needs of the mind, needs of the heart; need breeds need, and they assail the poor most often as an armed band. Ignorance and vice are potent causes of poverty. To attempt to diminish poverty by simply supplying immediate material needs is like attempting to fill a sieve with water. We must educate as well as feed the poorer classes if we wish to deal rationally with their case. And by education, of course, I mean not only general elementary instruction, but also and chiefly that preparation of mind and heart which promotes purer homes, higher social tastes, which tends to shelter the poor from corrupting agencies and to bring them into permanent connection with religious influences. Now, how is that to be done? The question was raised in Liverpool sixty-four years ago by a small band of devoted religious men, among whom were William Rathbone, Dr. Martineau, John Hamilton Thom, Thomas Holt, S. S. Gair, William Jevons, Samuel Bright, Joseph Blanco White, H. Booth, and others, and the answer has been the Liverpool Domestic Mission. And their object was precisely put in the very words I have used, for I find that one of the principal resolutions moved and adopted at the historic meeting of Good Friday, April 1, 1836, at Renshaw-street Chapel, ran as follows:—

That the appropriate duties of the minister of the poor shall be to establish an intercourse with a limited number of families of the neglected poor, to put himself into close sympathy with their wants and feelings, to become to them a Christian adviser and friend, to promote the order and comfort of their homes, and the elevation of their social tastes, to bring them into a permanent connection with religious influences, and, above all to promote an effective education to their children, and to shelter them from corrupting agencies.

Here was a rational and truly Christian interpretation of the words of our text—"The poor shall never cease out of the land." It was a permanent organisation to meet a permanent need, and thus a great and noble work was inaugurated. It has been carried on faithfully and well to the present day, thanks to the devotion of the men who have had charge of the Domestic Mission. It has been a truly Christian work done in a truly Christian spirit. Unfortunately, it is characteristic of such a work that it should grow even more rapidly than the means of support needed for its execution, and, again and again appeals have had to be made in order that the efficiency of the mission should not be compromised by the lack of adequate means. Such an appeal it is our duty to make to-day, and we feel convinced that, as heretofore, it will not be made in vain. All cannot give time to such a work, yet all must feel an interest in it; all have, as members of the human family, as citizens of this great city, an interest in it. The work is entirely undenominational, and, therefore, I may without scruple appeal to all. Yet I wish to appeal more especially to you, members of our Free Churches, to you who realise the duty of love laid upon your consciences by the religion you profess, by the very prosperity which so many of you enjoy. In opening your hand wide unto your poorer brethren at the present crisis you will be giving, if I may so speak, sacramental efficacy to that faith which inspired your forefathers, the founders of the Domestic Mission, and inspires you still, a faith not only free but loving, not only an intellectual strength, but also an abiding Christian inspiration.

The collections of the day amounted to £192 18s. 9d.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SOUTH WALES.

Now that the echoes of the London Bazaar, which for so many months proved such a valuable incentive to useful and congenial work in our churches, are passing away, some of us are beginning to think it will be a good thing to be on the lookout again for fresh fields and pastures new. The new century in Wales only begins next year, and the question seems to arise naturally, How shall we duly celebrate it? Having learnt so well how to get up steam and to overcome that inertia which is so liable to clog Unitarian adventure, it were a thousand pities to allow the discovery to remain unused and our new-born energies to run to waste. We want once more to bring new effort to bear upon new work—some grand object that will unite all our Welsh churches. What shall that object be? Can we not have another bazaar—a bazaar on our own account? Our Swansea friends have just had one, and, notwithstanding that circumstances threw them very much on their own resources, a successful one. Could we but hit on the right object, our natural enthusiasm will do the rest. I would suggest as a motive that some of our churches are heavily handicapped with debt, and that we might by one great and united effort sweep all this away, and thus set them all the more free for the work and the worship for which they were intended. As it is, many who sympathise with our views and aims are known to stand aloof lest they should in some way incur responsibility in connection with the debt. Some say they don't believe in chapel debts. Ruskin did not, but we knew a Baptist minister who thanked God for his chapel debt, because it gave the members in the big pew something to do rather than quarrel among themselves and find fault with their minister. I refer to those debts at present as a motive for concerted action. The debts are there, and most of them probably unavoidable from the first, if the interest of the cause was to receive due consideration; and being there they hamper the work of the congregation and tend to reduce the minister to Mafeking rations.

Again we need to consider what can be done to consolidate our present churches and to extend our outposts. Like the Roman Catholics, we suffer much from leakages—they at the bottom, we at the top. How are those leakages to be stopped? Do we sufficiently impress upon our people from the pulpit and upon our children at home, the grandeur of our heritage, our noble traditions, our long and distinguished line of splendid workers in the cause of religion and humanity, the value and importance of our principles, our simple faith—a faith which is at the foundation of every other Christian faith, however much obscured by creed and dogma; a faith that welcomes the light of truth from whatever quarter it may come, without insulting the reason or confounding the issues at the bar of conscience.

It is interesting to read how the pioneers of Unitarianism in Wales did their work. When Howell Harris and Daniel Rowland, in the last century, were carrying their doctrines of fire and blood over the hills and valleys of Wales, our little churches entrenched themselves behind the fortifications of reason and common sense, and have been able to hold their own even to this day, but unfortunately they have done little more. The Rev. William Evans, M.A., Pembroke Dock, in his recently published "Outline of the History of Welsh Theology" (Nisbet and Co., 1900), says, with too much truth, "It cannot be maintained that it [Unitarianism] has displayed any power of self-extension." The rector of Llangeitho, in the March number of the Traethodydd, thus pithily relates the story of Unitarianism in South Cardiganshire: "The fiery seraph, Daniel Rowland, did not succeed in establishing a single cause anywhere between Llangeitho and Twrgwyn, a distance of twenty miles. The ministrations of Jenkin Jones, Llwynrhydowen; David Lloyd, Brynllefrith; and David Davis, of Castle Howel, extinguished the fires of Llangeitho."

Another word of the history above mentioned may not be amiss. It is written by an old and valued friend of mine and fellow-student of forty years ago, and is one of the few original works dealing with Welsh subjects in the English language. The author is a Calvinistic Methodist, and surveying his field of operations through the Methodist end of his telescope, he is able to deal with most of his subject in a spirit of sympathy. He does not give us an impartial history, but notwithstanding its limitations, I have found it intensely interesting. It takes the reader over much unfamiliar ground, and gives a panoramic review of 350 years of Welsh theology, not distinguishable as far as I can see from similar types of English theology, being mostly of the uniform, postage-stamp, "as it was in the beginning and is now" kind, but supplying interesting particulars of men and books from the days of Bishops Lloyd, Jewel, Bayley, &c., in the sixteenth century down to the Nonconformist celebrities of to-day. Mr. Evans has no sympathy with so-called heretics, and the works of all supposed to be so tainted sink into insignificance in his sight, and are either dismissed with scant courtesy or ignored altogether. Even such works as the "Imitation of Christ," "The Whole Duty of Man" and Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living"—of which there are Welsh translations—do not come up to his standard of orthodoxy, for in them "religion is little more than morality and formality." They do not "show the lost state and wickedness of man and God's gracious plan to raise him from his sinful and miserable condition." Such a heretic as Dr. Rowland Williams, of Essays and Reviews notoriety, though a mighty scholar and as patriotic a Welshman as ever breathed, is not so much as mentioned; although Professor Fisher, of Yale, in his "History of Doctrine," published by T. and T. Clark, 1897, mentions no other Welshman besides Pelagius as a contributor to Theology. Perhaps Professor Fisher looked through the other end of the telescope!

The Rev. W. Tudor Jones, of Swansea, a convert from Methodism, standing more in the open, seems to me to have a broader outlook and a truer perspective than Mr. Evans, and he is able to write more sympathetically of other denominations than his own. In his little book just published (cloth 1s. 6d., to be obtained of the author) on the "Progress of Free Thought at Swansea," Mr. Jones traces step by step the gradual changes through which his Church passed in its pilgrimage from Calvinism to Unitarianism; and supplies us with interesting biographies of most of the ministers. His book deserves a good sale.

Our Welsh Sunday-schools have reason to be thankful to the Rev. W. James, of Llandyssul, for providing them with lessons on St. Mark. The lessons are sixty-eight in number, making a book of 224 pp., with a map. They were prepared by some twenty different writers, who seem to have made a good use of the English text-books published by Solly, Carpenter, Gannett, &c. Of all the many works on St. Mark hitherto published in Welsh, I shall not be far from the mark if I venture to say this is the only one approximately up to date.

We have also reason to be thankful to the Committee of the B. and F.U.A. for the continued interest they manifest in the welfare and success of our work in Wales. We have had recently published at their expense several tracts—a translation of Dr. Brooke Herford's on "Roman Catholicism," published afterwards in extenso in the Herald Cymraeg, a weekly newspaper, which has the largest circulation in North Wales; "The Modern View of the Bible," by Dr. William Griffiths; "Religion and Science," by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins; "Jesus our Leader," by the Rev. D. John Williams. We should like to see all our churches helping themselves by helping to distribute these tracts.

There is not much that is fresh to report about our little group of churches, either the English or the Welsh. There is a good deal of steady work done by both sections—separately. The linguistic difficulty continues to present a more or less insurmountable obstacle to united effort, and so failing of greater union we fail of that greater strength which proverbially goes with union. There must, surely, be many lines of approach possible, and a more determined effort on both sides to seek these, would soon help to realise the truth of the old adage, Where there is a will there is a way. The pulpit of Cwmbach is now vacant, and the church has to depend on supplies. Our Merthyr friends have definitely decided—and none too soo—to have a new chapel and a new schoolroom erected in a central position in the town. The new chapel at Ciliau has just been opened free of debt. Our church at Lampeter, I am sorry to say, is in great distress. The fine building, erected at a considerable expense in 1875–6, almost under the shadow of St. David's College, owing to the architect's singular neglect of the explicit instructions given in St. Matt. vii. 26, 27, is in danger of collapsing. Most of the churches connected with the South East Wales Society, decided at their last meeting to localise the Seed Sower for home use.

Since my last letter was written Wales has lost a great benefactor by the death, on March 22, of the Rev. Thomas Charles Edwards, M.A., D.D., the first principal of University College, Aberystwyth—really the maker of it—and at the time of his death Principal of Bala Theological College. Born in 1837, the eldest son of the founder and first Principal of Bala College, descended on his mother's side from Thomas Charles, of Bala, founder of the Welsh Sunday School, and one of the founders of the Bible Society, young Edwards had a distinguished career at London University, and afterwards at Oxford, where he came strongly under the influence of Jowett. He was ordained, August 11, 1864, and held a pastorate at Liverpool—his only one—1866-72. In 1872 he was appointed Principal of the new College at Aberystwyth, an appointment most fortunate for the Principality, for it secured at once the sympathy and co-operation of the most influential community in Wales—the Calvinistic Methodists. He made the College and was the pioneer of the grand and perfected system of higher education in Wales, now crowned by a University. His Liverpool experience which had brought him into touch with the churches proved of great service. He was already a powerful and polished preacher, both in English and Welsh, and in his new sphere he seldom missed the opportunity of carrying the Christian message on the Sunday to some little church or other, thus keeping up a connection that was of essential service to the welfare and success of the College.

Dr. Edwards had to discharge his duties to the College amid many adverse influences. He had his ideas—the College must be perfectly free and absolutely unsectarian, and nothing else would succeed in Nonconformist Wales; but he found arrayed against him the bishops and the clergy of the privileged Church; and the nobility and gentry, with a few noble exceptions, when they were not against him, were indifferent and would give no help; but where the golden shekels failed, the doctor knew that he could depend upon the people. His appeal was directed to the masses, the quarrymen of Bethesda and Festiniog, the colliers of Glamorgan, the artisans, tradesmen, working-men generally, and the farmers up and down the country, and the response was magnificent. He travelled all over Wales, and even visited the United States to advocate the interests of the College, and the College became an established fact; his ideal was realised, and he lived to see the rich fruit of his labours.

In 1892 he was prevailed upon to leave Aberystwyth to take charge of his father's old College at Bala. His ideals on removing here were only partially realised. They were (1) the reconstruction of Welsh theology, (2) the reconstruction of Welsh theological education by an unsectarian college. It may not be generally known that Dr. Edwards was prepared to exercise his influence in getting the Bala College removed to Aberystwyth provided that of Carmarthen were also removed, and many have no hesitation in saying that the Presbyterian Board was ill-advised in not falling in with the suggestion.

His creed was a mild orthodoxy, with his face undoubtedly to the light. He had reached no finality. He was intensely loyal to the Christian faith, but he set truth above orthodoxy. That was a remarkable saying of his, made at Aberayron, about "lightening the cargo of the Methodist ship!" There were three persons—in every way very differently constructed—for whom he had an unbounded admiration, his father, Jowett, and C. H. Spurgeon, and traces of the influence of each may undoubtedly be found reflected in his own character, and these combined helped to make him the theologian preacher and educationist that he was. His commentaries on 1 Cor. and Hebrews are characterised by the scholarship, candour and thoroughness of similar German works. The former is dedicated to Professor Jowett and his father, and will be found referred to in the recently published "Encyclopædia Biblica." His famous "Davies Lecture" on the God-man manifests the instinct and thoroughness of the trained theologian.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEAL.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—The Rev. Frederic Allen appeals for more help in two branches of the work of this Mission. More teachers are urgently needed for the Sunday-school, especially in the afternoon; and the depositors in the Provident Bank have so largely increased during the past year, that the present visitors would warmly welcome the assistance of other helpers, who would share the work with them. What is required is that two or three hours should be given on Monday mornings to call on the depositors and collect the money. Friends willing to help are requested to communicate with Mr. Allen as soon as possible.

Ainsworth.—The reopening services of the Presbyterian Chapel, after beautifying and renovating, were held on Sunday last. The preacher in the afternoon was the Rev. M. R. Scott; and in the evening a choral service (specially arranged) was rendered by the choir, with connective readings by the Rev. M. R. Scott. The collections, which were in aid of the renovation fund, amounted to over £22.

Billingshurst.—A meeting to welcome the Rev. G. Lansdown, the newly-appointed minister, was held on Tuesday week at the General Baptist Chapel, and in spite of the rain, most welcome to the farmers, who chiefly compose this village congregation, was well attended. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. W. Carter, and the meeting was opened with prayer by the Rev. J. J. Marten, of Horsham. A letter was read from the vicar, the Rev. A. H. Barron, with thanks for an invitation to be present, and wishing God-speed to the new minister; also letters of regret and good wishes from the Rev. W. G. Tarrant and Mr. T. Bond, of Portsmouth. The Rev. E. M. Daplyn, formerly Mr. Lansdown's neighbour in East Anglia; Messrs. T. Turner and J. Carter, treasurer and secretary of the congregation; the Rev. C. Hoddinott, of Chichester, who had known the congregation for over thirty years; the Rev. A. J. Marchant, for himself and on behalf of the General Baptist Assembly; the Rev. S. Pendred, as a Congregationalist and fellow-worker in the village; the Rev. J. J. Marten; the Rev. F. Allen, secretary of the Provincial Assembly; the Rev. Hubert Clarke, of Godalming, who quoted a saying of Emerson's, that he who counted numbers in religion had no religion to count; and the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, of Guildford, all joined in a hearty welcome to the new minister, with words of faith, sympathy, and encouragement, and Mr. Lansdown responded. He felt that he was surrounded by friends, and thanked them all for their words of welcome. He assured Mr. Pendred that he believed the time had gone by when those who thought differently should stand apart in practical work. He would gladly give to his congregation the best inspiration that came to him, and trusted to be like Wordsworth's Water-lily, firmly rooted, yet free and ever turning sunward and Godward. Selections of music added to the enjoyment of a very pleasant evening.

Belfast: All Souls' Church.—On Thursday evening, May 24, a social meeting of the members of the congregation, of whom there was a large attendance, was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, in connection with the approaching departure of the Rev. Edgar I. Fripp, B.A., from Belfast. The chair was occupied by Mr. John F. Mulligan, who in making a farewell presentation to Mr. Fripp, said that the Reading and Rambling Club, the Ladies' Working Society, the Children's Club, and some others, had already given Mr. and Mrs. Fripp some tokens of their regard and esteem, and they, as a congregation, desired to do likewise. The gifts consisted of a complete set of Ruskin's works for Mr. Fripp, and a purse of sovereigns for Mr. and Mrs. Fripp. No doubt Mr. Fripp would often turn over the pages of those books, and, as he read and appreciated the views of Mr. Ruskin on art in various forms, he was sure that he would frequently recall to mind a work of art—of architectural art—that he himself (Mr. Fripp) had been chiefly instrumental in building up in Belfast. He referred, of course, to All Souls' Church. Mr. Ruskin had desired them to learn how to form "houses built without hands for our souls to live in." Mr. Fripp had been teaching them in Belfast lessons on the same subject for the last nine years; and Mr. Fripp had done more than that—he had been their leader and helper in raising up a beautiful house built with hands, where they might unite for the worship of God and the service of man. They hoped that Mr. and Mrs. Fripp would visit Belfast from time to time, and he need scarcely say that they would be heartily welcomed at All Souls' Church. The Chairman then read the following address:—"Dear Mr. Fripp,—We, the members of the congregation in All Souls' Church, desire to take this opportunity of expressing to you our sincere and heartfelt sorrow at losing you. Both as minister and friend you have won our highest respect and affection, and we have esteemed it a very great privilege to be able to listen to your inspiring and ennobling teaching from Sunday to Sunday in our beautiful church, where we hope to hear you often from your old pulpit. You have been a hard student and worker, and you have always given us your best both spiritually and intellectually. You have also worked well for the enlightenment and welfare of our city. We ask you to accept as a token of our esteem and affection, and in grateful appreciation of your valued friendship and ministry, the accompanying gift of Ruskin's works. We also ask you and Mrs. Fripp to accept, with our love, the enclosed purse, and we wish you, your wife, and your children every blessing.—Signed on behalf of the congregation, J. MONTGOMERY (Chairman of Committee), JOHN F. MULLIGAN (Treasurer), ADAM MILLIN (Secretary). All Souls' Church, May 24, 1900."—Mr. Fripp, in the course of his reply, thanked the congregation for the gifts, and said that for some weeks past he had been living in an atmosphere of love and affection. He expressed his sorrow at leaving his friends in Belfast, both inside and outside the congregation, but stated that his return to England was a matter of duty. He anticipated a prosperous future for All Souls' Church under his successor, whoever he might be, and he was sure the members would uphold the great principles for which the Second Congregation had always stood. The Rev. Douglas Walmsley, B.A., and the Rev. Richard Lyttle, who were present, expressed their regret that Mr. Fripp was leaving Belfast. Mr. Fripp preached his farewell sermons at All Souls' Church on Sunday, May 27, morning and evening, to large congregations.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—A grand musical service was held on Sunday evening, May 20, when the new church was crowded. An augmented choir sang choruses from the Judas Maccabæus, and by request, "The Hallelujah Chorus" from the Messiah. The Rev. W. J. Davies, who conducted the choir, gave an address on the oratorio selected, wherein he explained its origin, its purport, and the character of its music, laying special stress on the solos and choruses sung during the evening. The solos were rendered by Miss Gordon, Messrs. Gordon, Lucas and Haughey. The collection was satisfactory, and the attendance was historic, as it was the largest crowd that was ever on the Mountpottinger premises. On Monday evening, May 28, the annual meeting of the congregation was held, under the presidency of Mr. James Davidson (hon. sec.). The Chairman read his report, so did Mr. Napier (hon. treasurer), while Mr. Hanna and Mr. Gillsland (hon. sec. and hon. treasurer of the Sunday-school) did likewise. The various officers of the church were re-elected. Mr. J. E. Griffiths and Mr. McCullough were elected members of the Committee vice Miss Martin, deceased, and Mr. George Crookes, an old and faithful member who is leaving Belfast for Moira. From Dr. Munn's report it was gleaned that the new church is practically free from debt. Negotiations are in progress about the land for building a new hall for Sunday-school and other purposes.

Blackpool: Bank-street.—On Sunday, May 27, a flower service was held, morning and evening, conducted by the Rev. D. Davis, the music being rendered by the children of the Sunday-school and the choir. The children, as well as their elders, brought flowers to the service, and the church was prettily decorated. Both attendance and offertory were good. In addition to the ordinary collections, generous donations were made to the Indian Famine Fund. Strenuous efforts are being made to open the new schools free of debt.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The two years for which the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., was appointed as assistant minister having expired, a farewell conversazione was held in Bank-street schools on Monday last, and was largely attended. Part way through the proceedings the chair was taken by Mr. W. H. Higgin, B.Sc., chairman of the Chapel Committee, who said that farewells in general were dismal occasions when the parting was between close friends and for a prolonged period. In this case, however, there was less of that element than usual; for their friend was not going far, and was really carrying out an important part of the scheme they started with in accepting the full charge of one of our pulpits. One of their declared objects in establishing the assistant ministry was the gaining of experience by our young ministers in the practical work of their congregation, under the guidance of their able and experienced minister, Mr. Street. The fact was, if the scheme worked as intended, they must resign themselves to a series of separations. Indeed, even if they wished, how could they expect to keep with them for long men of the calibre of their friend, Mr. Anderton? Looking back on his stay with them, they would all be ready to acknowledge that he had well and honourably performed the duties and upheld the standard of practical and ideal life they associated with the honoured name of "Unitarian Minister," and higher praise than that they could not give. Of the numerous personal ties of friendship he had formed among them, they were sure many would survive the wear and tear of time, and always remain as valued results of his stay among them. Mr. Anderton already knew in what esteem the members of the Halliwell Mission held him, and he (the chairman) now wished to place on record their congregation's pride and satisfaction in his work there, and to thank him for the sympathy and energy which he had put into that enterprise, so that it already showed rapid advance. Whilst on this subject he must say that they had reason for congratulation on the manner in which this project had been carried out, upon the energy and capacity shown by Mr. Street and the building committee, and upon the generosity with which the congregation as a whole met the cost. Site and building were necessary to success, and they provided them free of debt; but the personal service of the right sort so absolutely requisite for success had been, and was being rendered, and Mr. Anderton had deserved their best thanks there. As the representative of the Bank-street congregation, he wished Mr. Anderton farewell on the completion of his duties towards them, and God-speed in his new sphere of work. Mr. Thomas Harwood spoke in like terms of Mr. Anderton's work in the Sunday-school, Mr. Walter Simpson on behalf of the Young People's Society, and the Rev. H. M. Livens as a brother minister. The Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., referred to the gratifying success of the two years' experiment of a double ministry, a success chiefly due to the fact of the loyalty of Mr. Anderton. It had been no divided ministry, which would have been a disaster, but there had been one aim, and a united effort. Now that the parting time had come, he felt sincere regret in saying good-bye to a faithful colleague, whom he hoped to keep as a life-long friend. The chairman then, on behalf of Bank-street congregation and school, presented Mr. Anderton with ten volumes of "Chambers's Encyclopædia" and six volumes of the Polychrome Bible as a memento of their regard. Mr. Anderton feelingly responded, and expressed the deep satisfaction he felt on looking back at the two years' happy work at Bank-street, and intimate connection with Mr. Street, and the assurance that the experience he had thus gained would be of great service to him in his ministry at Preston and throughout his future career. On the Thursday previous a similar farewell conversazione was held at Halliwell-road Mission, at which Mr. Caleb Wood, on behalf of the members of the mission congregation, the teachers and elder scholars expressed their deep regret at Mr. Anderton's departure and their best wishes for his future, and presented him with a handsome standard lamp.

Mr. Anderton begins his ministry at Preston on Whit Sunday.

Exeter.—At a meeting of the social circle at George's Meeting on Monday evening, May 21, addresses were given by the Rev. Marion Murdoch on "Ideals in Church Work," and the Rev. Florence Buck on "Fellowship and Service." Conversation on the subject of the addresses followed, and a hymn of Theodore Parker's was sung. The Rev. T. W. Chignell was in the chair.

Godalming.—The eighty-second anniversary of the Meadrow Sunday-school was celebrated last Sunday. The Rev. Hubert Clarke preached in the morning. In the afternoon the children's flower service was conducted, and an address given by Mr. Edward Ellis, J.P., C.C., who was for many years a teacher in the school. The flowers, gathered for the occasion by the scholars, were sent, according to custom, to the East London Hospital for Children. After the service about sixty visitors had tea in the schoolroom. In the evening the service was conducted and the sermon preached by the Rev. H. W. Ellis, who, in the course of his address, gave an interesting sketch of the origin and history of the school. The Meadrow String Band assisted at the musical portion of the services, and, besides accompanying the hymns, played selections from Mendelssohn's St. Paul and Handel's Samson. The congregations, which included many friends from Guildford, were good, and the collection for the school larger than it had been for several years.

Hull.—Sunday school anniversary services were held in the Park-street Church on Sunday last, conducted by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, who preached in the morning on "The Symmetrical Completeness of Life." Special children's hymns were sung.

Kilmarnock.—The Rev. A. C. Henderson, M.A., B.D., who recently lectured on "Electricity" (with illustrative experiments), under the auspices of the Educational Department of the Kilmarnock Co-operative Society, has received from the society, as a token of their thanks and appreciation, a gift of Fahie's "History of Wireless Telegraphy," and the Oxford edition of Longfellow and Burns.

London: Bermondsey. — The Sunday-school anniversary service was held at Fort-road Church last Sunday. The appeal for flowers was liberally responded to, and the church presented a very pretty appearance. The services were altogether very successful, the congregation in the evening numbering about 100 persons. In the afternoon Miss Dixon, one of the Sunday-school teachers, who has been connected with both the Sunday-school and church for a great number of years, was the recipient of a present, given by her fellow-teachers and members of the choir, on the occasion of her marriage, which took place on May 28.

London: Stepney.—The religious conference to be held at College Chapel next Sunday afternoon will be of special interest. It will be opened by the Rev. Florence Buck, of Cleveland, Ohio, U.S.A., who, after a successful pastorate of some years in that town, has been making a tour in Europe. Miss Buck will also occupy the pulpit on Sunday evening, and as she is about to sail for America, there will be few other opportunities of hearing her. Visitors will be most welcome at the conference and tea, and it is hoped they will stay to evening service.

Nottingham: High Pavement (Appointment). — The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Liscard, has accepted an invitation to the ministry of the High Pavement Chapel, in succession to the Rev. W. E. Addis, M.A., and will enter on his duties at the beginning of August.

REMEMBER that our life is ultimately regulated by our highest thought; therefore trust while the outer is becoming adjusted to the inner. Remember that this highest thought is strengthened by the will we put into it—the attention we give it, by our spirit.—Horatio Dresser.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

Offices: 62, Strand, London.

"As the moral perceptions of the race enlarge, and we thereby learn to solve some of our most difficult problems, it is clear that man will no longer be able to face the idea of shifting, or trying to shift, the burden he has made for himself, by his own sin and folly, on to the shoulders of his weaker brethren. . . . Whatever our immediate successors may decide as to the general question of the rights of animals, and the duties of men towards them, it is certain that the human conscience already protests against systematically inflicting torture upon them, for any object, good or bad; and that, in proportion as the moral sense grows in clearness and insight, strength of all kinds will be used less and less for the ends of personal dominion, and more and more for purposes of chivalry and of mercy."—See "The Ethics of Vivisection," by Mrs. Mona Caird. MINISTERS' CONFERENCE.

A MINISTERS' CONFERENCE will be held at ESSEX HALL, on THURSDAY AFTERNOON, JUNE 7th. An Address on "The Christian Minister, as Prophet," will be given by the Rev. JOHN BYLES, of Northampton. Chair to be taken by the Rev. J. S. MUMMERY, Ph.D., President of the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting, at 4 o'clock. Tea at 5.30. Ministers from the Country are cordially invited.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, IPSWICH.

It is desired to celebrate this year the Bicentenary of the opening of this Chapel by executing the structural and other repairs necessary for its preservation, and also to effect certain sorely-needed improvements, including the supply of warming apparatus, and otherwise. The estimated cost of these works is £1,500. Towards this, in response of their recent appeal, nearly £800 has been received. Thus, £700 is still required for the completion of the works.

Whilst thanking those who have already so kindly responded, the committee venture to appeal to others of the Faith, who have not yet contributed, to favourably consider the case, and to enable the works to be carried out, and help to place the cause, in so promising a field as Ipswich, upon a satisfactory footing.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR anniversary meetings have been full of interest, and when the result comes to be quietly considered, it will be seen that there is much reason for thankfulness, but still more reason for a steadfast forward look, with the determination to take a firmer hold upon our work, that we may render far better service in the coming years. We must leave our reports this week to speak for themselves. Sermon, President's Address, the Conference papers are all rich in suggestion, and next week we shall have further riches to gather up from the abundant provision of the week. It is perhaps not necessary for us to enter into controversy with Mr. Sunderland as to his reference to what he called "the great practical mistake" of Dr. Martineau's life. He will not expect us to agree with him. Happily we can be cordially united in our common work without re-opening that old controversy, at a time when no heated discussion should disturb our thought of him who has so recently passed from our sight, but never from our hearts.

TUESDAY brought back to us, but only just in time, our friends from the Boston anniversary meetings, who were due to take part in the Sunday School Association meeting, and the Unitarian Association meetings that followed. They brought to us the stimulus of the great meetings they had attended, and the pleasure of cordial fraternal greetings from our brethren across the water. Before long we shall have the Register with full reports of the meetings, for which we shall look the more eagerly after the accounts our representatives have already given of what they saw and heard.

THE programme of the anniversary week in Boston, May 20–27, is in itself a charming souvenir of the great gatherings. On the cover is the well-known beautiful portrait of Dr. Channing, instinct with the spirit which must always be the strength of our common work, and interleaved with the programme of the proceedings are five full pages, on which are grouped portraits of leading ministers and laymen of the community—in the centre of the first page Dr. Martineau, surrounded by Theodore Parker, Samuel J. May, W. H. Furness, George Putnam, James Walker, and Ephraim Peabody. On succeeding pages are Dr. Bellows, Orville Dewey, Rufus Ellis, Robert Collyer, M. J. Savage, Brooke Herford, Edward Everett Hall, Freeman Clarke, and other ministers, together with some of the elect laymen of the Unitarian body.

MR. A. E. EMSLIE is well known as a successful portrait painter, his beautiful portrait of Dr. Martineau, which was reproduced in our memorial number, being probably the best known of his works to our readers. But for some thirteen or fourteen years Mr. Emslie has had it in mind to paint a series of pictures representing the chief scenes in the life of Christ. During the last four years he has been entirely devoted to the completion of this work, and the result is now being exhibited in the Emslie Gallery, at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly. "God is Love" is the title Mr. Emslie has chosen to describe the motive of his exhibition, and it indicates the great earnestness with which he has devoted himself to the task. There are nine large oil-paintings, showing much imaginative power, and if one is not at once carried away by the beauty of the pictures, their interest deepens after quiet study. The symbolic nature of the pictures is seen at once in the first, "The Call," where the young carpenter stands with outstretched hands, from which angels are gently taking his tools, while the heap of shavings at his feet have become a confused mass of human forms in which are seen all the needs and ills which call him out to his new life of ministry. In "The Temptation" and "The Crucifixion," the physical features of starvation and of unalleviated agony are represented with painful realism. The artist says that his wife tried to dissuade him from painting "The Descent into Hell." Our feeling on looking at the pictures was that the unredeemed ghastliness of "The Crucifixion" should even with greater reason have remained unpainted. Mr. Emslie spent some time in Palestine, and in addition to the larger pictures, there are a number of water-colours, including some beautiful scenes in that country.

THE annual meeting of the Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers was held at the Sunday School Union House, 56, Old Bailey, on Tuesday, May 29. The chair was taken by J. J. Smith, Esq., J.P. It appears from the report that the income for the year was £952 9s. 8d., and the expenditure —including £991, distributed among eighty-one aged ministers, £1,037 0s. 8d. The Society has recently lost by death some good friends, and the Committee earnestly appeal for fresh subscriptions, which will be thankfully received by P. Cadby, Esq., 24, St. Peter's-square, Hammersmith, W., or by the secretary, the Rev. P. G. Scorey, Gibbons House, Billingshurst, Sussex.

MINISTERS' STIPEND AUGMENTATION FUND.—At the annual meeting of this Fund, on May 30, the following resolution was passed by the managers :—"That the members of the Committee of Management of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, at this their first annual meeting since the death of the Rev. James Martineau, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., Litt.D., desire to place on record some tribute of reverent affection for his memory and character.

"They would express their gratitude to God for a life so full of years and honours, of saintliness of mind and lofty spiritual thought, of heroic steadfast devotion to the free search for truth and light, of reverent discipleship to Jesus Christ. They would recall his invaluable services as a teacher and preacher of the Christianity of Jesus, unfettered and undimmed by the creeds and dogmas of succeeding centuries, while they lament the irreparable loss which accrues to the cause of spiritual philosophy from his death.

"They would also recall with pleasure the deep interest which the late Dr. Martineau took in the formation and subsequent success of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, and that he was a member of the Committee of Management from its formation in 1856 until his removal to London in 1858.

"They desire to express to the family of the late Dr. Martineau their profound and respectful sympathy with them in the loss they have sustained by the death of their illustrious Father."

THE UNDISCOVERED COUNTRY.

"CHILDREN who gather pebbles on the shore"—
Well said: and yet to our expectant gaze
There come anon strange hints of country o'er
The wild of waters lost in distant haze.
And, as Columbus fed his flouted faith
On scraps of carving, unfamiliar wood,
And drifted seaweeds; and encountered death
In following over ocean ideal good,
To find—and found—the New World of his creed,
We too have tokens;—follow we their lead.

THE ECLIPSE IN SWITZERLAND.

It was a piece of good luck to be standing where I was standing last Monday afternoon at the time of the eclipse. And it came about rather by accident than design. I was walking with some friends down the Simplon Pass from Berisal to Brieg. "We must remember the eclipse," we said, and in the interest of our walk forgot it again almost directly. And no wonder, considering that we were passing through a tract of country where the charm of the Alps is most kindly and intimate. There were snow-fields above us, and the remains of the winter avalanches about us; but we stood on fresh green pastures bubbling over with flowers. There were legions of yellow anemones, like captive sulphur butterflies, innumerable blue gentians, and a host of humbler beauties. The air was still but for the gentle sound of falling water, and the note of a bird here and there. A distant cuckoo repeated "that minor third that none but the cuckoo knows." The solemn pine forests were relieved by the tender spring green of the larch. No wonder we forgot the eclipse. But the eclipse was not to remain forgotten; it recalled itself forcibly.

We had made a series of windings, and were turning our backs on the Pass, and facing the Aletsch peak and glacier with other mountain giants. The Rhône Valley went stretching away far below on our left. Then the strange effects began. We had only one pair of dark spectacles between us, but a drift of cloud, light at the edges, hovered about the sun, and at some moments made a perfect medium. The dimness increased, and was not in the least the dimness of evening when the colours grow rich as the sun sinks lower. Every hue was deadened and dulled. The pine forests were masses of gloom. The snowfields where the diminished rays touched them gave back gleams of deathly paleness; the meadows were a cold ashy green. Strange bit of contrast to this dimness of colour was one stretch of the Rhône far below us; it burnt fiery red. The sun was a small crescent. Then, more quickly, it seemed to us, than the change from bright to dim, came the change to bright again. We turned into a short cut over some meadows; brighter and brighter came the flood of living light and colour. "You scarce could see the grass for flowers." The cicale made the air thrill and quiver with their incessant sharp notes. The cowbells sounded high and low; round the roofs of a hamlet lower down swallows darted with their shrill cries. All was bright and full of sound and movement. We had left the austere alpine solitude and silence, we had passed through the gloom of the eclipse, and were more than content with "the light of common day."

ARE you aware that life is very like a railway? One gets into the deep cuttings and long dark tunnels where one sees nothing, and hears twice as much noise as usual, and one can't read, and one shuts up the window and waits, and then it all comes clear again. Only in life it sometimes feels as if one had to dig the tunnel as one goes along, all new to oneself. Go straight on, however, and one's sure to come out into a new country, on the other side of the hills, sunny and bright.—Matthew Arnold.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The sixty-fifth annual meeting of this Association was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, the President, Mr. S. S. Tayler, in the chair. An opening hymn having been sung, the Treasurer, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., presented the statement of accounts, remarking that for the first time for many years there was a balance in hand. It was only £2 8s. 1d., and probably would not appear again. It was due chiefly to the fact that they had sold about £240 worth of books more than last year. Subscriptions were about the same, £222 19s. 8d., with subscriptions from schools and district societies making £290 15s. 2d. The sales of publications amounted to £1,194 13s. 1d. The total receipts, including a legacy of £90 from Mr. John Bentley, amounted to £1,590 16s. 3d. Among the payments some of the chief items were, for printing books, £146 4s. 6d.; for binding books, £111 11s. 7d.; for printing Young Days, £158 7s. 6d.; for illustrations of Young Days, £34 19s. 3d., and there had been a purchase for £300 of Consols. The balance of £17 1s. 9d. due to the treasurer had been turned into a credit balance as stated.

Mr. Ion Pritchard, who with Miss Pritchard received a hearty welcome on their return from America, presented the Committee's report, and in doing so said that he had received a letter from their old friend Mr. I. M. Wade, of whom they always thought in connection with that Association. Mr. Wade wrote to express his great regret at being unable to be present at meetings in which he always took so warm an interest. Turning to the report, Mr. Pritchard said that in drawing it up their first thought was naturally of Dr. Martineau, who had been their President, and had always been in close touch with every new effort made by the Association. The last time he had spoken at one of their meetings was after the inauguration of a scheme of theological classes, which had been taken up with considerable interest, but so that only a few of the members of the classes had offered themselves for examination; and Dr. Martineau had laid stress on the value of such examinations, as tests whether a subject had been really mastered. Mr. Pritchard also dwelt on the value of the Summer Session for teachers at Oxford, and referred to the books in course of preparation, the second series of Mr. J. C. Hirst's "Half Hours with the Parables" being actually in the press. Their exhibit of Sunday-school books and apparatus had been the only one at the Education Exhibition, and a selection from the exhibit had been sent to Paris, where, so far as he knew, it was the only representation of Sunday-school work from this country.

THE REPORT.

The report opened with a reference to the death of Dr. Martineau, his life-long interest in Sunday-school work, and the many services he rendered to the Association. Speaking of the Summer Session for Teachers at Oxford as one of the most successful of the Association's efforts, the report said:—"The Association has always acknowledged and appreciated the zeal and self-sacrifice of the teachers, but it has also recognised the increased importance of teaching the teacher, and the greater need there is for inspiring those who have lately taken up the work with a love for it, and of offering every possible encouragement to them. Short as the Oxford Session was, the Committee feel satisfied that to some extent this object of the Association has been fulfilled. The benefit and inspiration which the members of the Summer School derived from their stay at Oxford will not soon be forgotten, and its influence has been transplanted and felt in very many schools up and down the country."

The new session to be held in the present year was also referred to. Another important effort was described in the following passage:—"A further encouragement to the Sunday-school teachers may be derived from the recognition of the importance of their labours shown by the promoters of the Exhibitions of English Education held in London and in Paris. The Committee was asked to send exhibits showing the methods, means, and working of our Sunday-schools. This was no easy task, as the real work of the Institution in elevating the religious and moral standard of our scholars cannot be shown by visible means. At the same time, with the help of the Manchester District Sunday School Association and others, an interesting exhibit was shown of our class-books, forms, certificates, set of examination papers, and notices of the various activities connected with the schools. A selection of these was made by the English Exhibition Committee and forwarded to the Paris International Exhibition, and it may be mentioned that the display of the Sunday School Association is the only exhibit representing Sunday-school work in Great Britain, in London, and in Paris."

The formation of a Union of Scotch Sunday-schools was noted with satisfaction, also the helpfulness of the Book Grant Fund.

The finances showed for the first time for several years a small balance on the right side.

In addition to the annual volume of The Helper and Young Days, the publication was recorded of "Our Faith," by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, "The Story of Whittier," by Miss F. E. Cooke, a little book of "Addresses to Children," edited by Mrs. Rawlings, reprinted from The Inquirer, a school edition of "Outline Lessons in Morals," by Miss Gertrude Martineau, Mr. John Dendy's address at the last annual meeting on "The Sunday School Teacher as Social Reformer," and a booklet on "The Sunday School," by the Rev. J. J. Wright, written for distribution at the Education Exhibition. A forecast of forthcoming publications was added, including a second series of "Half-Hours with the Parables," by the Rev. J. C. Hirst, to be shortly published; and the new volume of The Helper, edited by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

The report then gave full particulars of the Oxford Summer Session, and also of the result of the Special Fund, which had not only provided a large number of Sunday-schools with books, but had been able to give a number of Biblical Manuals to 242 day-school teachers and students who had applied in answer to a single advertisement in The Schoolmaster.

In addition to the lantern slides illustrating Dr. Herford's "Story of Religion in England," it was reported that a further set, divided into three sections of fifty each, had been selected by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland to illustrate life and scenes in Palestine, and would be ready by October next. An appeal was added for further donations to the Special Grant Fund for the distribution of books.

The President moved the adoption of the reports, and spoke of the value of their work, not only to the children in the schools, but to the teachers, who, in undertaking the work, educated themselves. The Association was undogmatic, their object was not to indoctrinate the children with any creed or catechism, but to impress upon them the religiousness of life in every aspect. Looking back over a long connection with the Association, he recalled the great impulse given to its efforts by the coming of Manchester New College to London, where the professors and students threw themselves so heartily into the work of the Sunday-schools and of that Association.

The Rev. Alexander Ashworth, seconding the resolution, congratulated the Committee on their report and on the year's work. He dwelt upon the importance of the publishing department, and said that while they had most admirable books for teachers and elder scholars, there was not enough that was helpful for the teaching of quite young children. He thought it was most important to impress upon young children what they stood for, and the principles of their religious life. Only those who were themselves religious could give real religious teaching.

The Rev. Ambrose Bennett then moved:—

That the thanks of this meeting be given to the Officers and Committee of the Association for their services during the past year, and that the respective appointments for the coming year be as follows:—President: Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. Vice-Presidents: Frederick Nettlefold, Esq., I. M. Wade, Esq., Rev. James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., C. Fellows Pearson, Esq., Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., John Dendy, Esq., Stephen S. Tayler, Esq. Treasurer: Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., LL.D. Hon. Sec.: Mr. Ion Pritchard. Committee: Miss Ethel C. Lake, Miss Marian Pritchard, Rev. Frederic Allen, Mr. Ronald Bartram, Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Mr. Leslie C. Clarke, Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A., Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. W. S. Tayler. Together with a Delegate from each of the following Local Sunday School Societies, who are entitled to appoint Representatives under Rules 4 and 8:—The Bolton District Sunday School Union, the London Sunday School Society, the Manchester District Sunday School Association, the North East Lancashire Sunday School Union, the North Midland Sunday School Association, the South Eastern Sunday School Union, the Yorkshire Sunday School Union. Auditors: Howard Young, Esq., LL.B., A. H. Biggs, Esq., M.A., LL.M.

In doing so he referred to the Oxford Summer School for Teachers and said that a happier idea had seldom been conceived, and seldom had a happy idea been more happily carried out. As superintendent of a school from which teachers had gone to Oxford he bore witness to the great benefit they had derived, and the stimulus it had been to the other teachers at home. He was very glad a second session was to be held.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. Ellis Mace, J.P., and supported by the Rev. A. Harvie, who paid a tribute to the unfailing courtesy and business skill of Mr. Hare, their business manager, to whom they were much indebted.

The President then moved:—

That the hearty welcome of this meeting be given to the following representatives of affiliated and kindred societies:—Irish Non-Subscribing Sunday School Association, Rev. Alexander Ashworth; Scottish Sunday School Union, Rev. H. Williamson; Welsh Sunday Schools, Rev. W. T. Jones; Bolton District Sunday School Union, Rev. J. J.

Wright; Liverpool Sunday School Society, Miss R. M. Beaumont; London Sunday School Society, Miss M. Cooper; Manchester District Sunday School Association, Rev. S. A Steinthal; Midland Sunday School Association, Mrs. Wright; North Cheshire Sunday School Union, Rev. W. Harrison; North East Lancashire Sunday School Union, P. Bibby, Esq.; North Midland Sunday School Association, Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A.; Southern Sunday School Union, Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A.; South Cheshire Sunday School Union, Rev. J. C. Street; South Eastern Sunday School Union, J. Ellis Mace, Esq., J.P.; Western Sunday School Union, Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A.; Yorkshire Sunday School Union, Mrs. Rawlings.

The resolution was carried by acclamation, and the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, responded. He said that in former years he had often felt that the Sunday-school meeting was the best of all, and he confessed to having missed the breakfast, but that was a good meeting with which to begin the week. He thought their friends in the North hardly realised yet that the Sunday-school meeting was held on Tuesday, or they would be present in larger numbers. He then proceeded to speak of the great value of the work of the Association, and especially of its publications. Following the President's reference to the interest of the professors of Manchester College in the Association, he recalled the old days while the College was still in Manchester, where the students had done capital work in the schools of the district, and he rejoiced that the College was still keeping up its connection with Sunday-school work. It was a great satisfaction to him that that noble institution should be brought into close touch with the best work their congregations were doing.

The resolution having been passed the meeting adjourned for tea, and at 7.30 the President again took the chair, and after an opening hymn, on behalf of the meeting, offered a warm greeting to Miss Marian Pritchard, on her return, who had done so much in many ways for their Association.

Miss PRITCHARD then gave an address on:—

A GLIMPSE AT SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK IN AMERICA.

During her visit, Miss Pritchard said, she had come to realise very clearly that there were two completely different meanings attached to the word Sunday-school, which it was of the greatest importance to their work to keep distinctly in mind. The first meaning of Sunday-school was as nursery of the Church. As such it had existed from time immemorial, from the simply prudential motive of self-preservation, that in every religious community provision might be made for carrying it on in the future. Hence classes of young children came to be gradually associated with Sunday catechising; and a moral motive was added to the prudential, from the desire that others also might share what was found to be so true in principle and thought, and so helpful and full of encouragement. The second meaning of Sunday-school had a different starting point, when after sporadic attempts to meet the needs of the poor, neglected children mainly in cities, Robert Raikes about 140 years ago began a systematic plan, paying four dames a shilling a Sunday to gather poor children together to keep them from evil habits and make them a little happier, cleaner, and healthier. The thought of this was not for the Church, but for the children's sake; and in some large towns different churches joined together in the common work to raise the children. That idea naturally took possession of their people, who laid so much stress on the service of man, and before long the thought came that this ought not to be paid work, but should be done by the people themselves.

The motive was strictly religious, to show love to God by the service of man. Children were gathered together in the churches, and in teaching and caring for them young people were urged to show their faith by their works. And as blessings no less than curses "come home to roost," that service developed the fibre of their young people in a way they could not be too thankful for. There was not time on the Sunday to have school both for the young people of the congregation and neglected children outside, and they had chosen to care for the outside children. The aim was to mould the character of the children and lift them to a higher ideal; and now that the day-school put tools into their hands, they had to teach the children how most worthily to use their tools. Of the result none could doubt who were able to contrast the condition of the children before and after the Education Act of 1870. As time went on they came more and more to teach the children the foundation of the faith they held dear, feeling that what was helpful to themselves would be so to the children. Thus the two meanings of Sunday-school were found to be on converging lines, but they must always be clear which they were going to put first, the churches or the good of the individual child.

Their American friends had followed the lines of the first meaning, making their schools nurseries of the Church, and an excellent work it was. They had, indeed, some Mission-schools, but for the most part the Sunday-school was of the children of the congregation; yet the lines were converging, and she had several times heard it urged that the first thing was the moulding of character.

Miss Pritchard then described visits she had paid to several schools in America. Her first visit had been most disappointing. The school was in Philadelphia, and although the church was a fine one, there were only about eighteen children in the school, with six teachers, but a good number of the children had already left and the school was regularly closed from May till October. The meeting at which she was present, to which she had received a very pleasant invitation, began with a service, with a liturgical form which seemed to her too long, so that very little time was left for the class teaching. After that visit it was re-assuring to receive a letter from Mr. Bowie next day from Washington telling of a school there where everything was alert and going well.

Her next visit was to Chicago, where her brother visited the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones's school, and she went to a Universalist school, said to be the best in the city, and with that she was delighted. A solicitor was the superintendent, and his wife had the infant class. After an opening hymn and prayer the infant class was divided from the rest by shutters, and the little ones were welcomed by their teacher, and then asked in their turn to welcome the visitors, which they did by singing four simple lines with very pretty action. After that three little new-comers in the class were welcomed first by the teacher and then by the class with similar singing. Next the teacher asked if it was the birthday of any of them, and when three little hands went up, the children came forward, and in answer to the question told their age by dropping into a glass money-box a cent for each year, after which a song of greeting was sung. Then followed the lesson, beautifully simple and direct. The whole scene left a charming picture on her mind. The main part of the school was taught one lesson, prepared by the superintendent and minister together, notes being printed on a leaflet in the church Messenger, given round to the teachers with a copy for each child, also pictures illustrating the scene of the lesson (the life of Jesus). Each child had a scrap-book, and after the lesson leaflet and pictures were pasted into the book. It was a beautiful idea, fairly well carried out. The oldest class was being taught by the minister. The school was held immediately after the church service, which the children did not attend.

At Toronto, where the next visit was paid, she seemed to be in England again. School was held after service, and all was nicely arranged; there was an opening service, and then class teaching, of that high character to which they were accustomed at Portland-street. There were leaflets and class books, but not one special lesson.

Then she came to Boston, and at the Church of the Disciples (James Freeman Clarke's church) saw an ideal superintendent, Mrs. Beattley, who did not talk about reverence, but was reverent; who did not talk about interesting children, but interested them entirely. The visit was paid on a special Sunday, when an annual recitation was held. Pictures were shown on a screen telling of the course of the session, which had been the life of Jesus, interspersed with recitations and song. First came a beautiful opening service, conducted by Mrs. Beattley, in which she and the children repeated the Beatitudes together; then, after one or two pictures on the screen, a girl recited with natural feeling and beautiful enunciation the passage from the life of Jesus about his first visit to Jerusalem. Others followed, and some passages were given by all together, with dramatic power, intelligence, and perfect enunciation. Then, after some announcements, the school was divided into classes, separated by screens, and with a table for each class, round which the children sat, so that she might see the ordinary working of the school. It was a large school, with about 150 children. In the afternoon she saw one of the mission schools where, after the opening, small classes were formed of only four or five each, except in the youngest and most advanced, and some of the scholars were from forty to fifty years of age. Those little groups made pleasant happy parties.

Those were the schools she had visited. Their weak spot, as it seemed to her, was that the children of the congregation did not as a rule attend the church service with their parents; and if there had to be choice between the meeting in class and service with father and mother, she should choose the service.

With the Sunday-school meeting in Boston in anniversary week she was somewhat disappointed, the four speakers, of whom she had the honour of being the first, making their speeches, but quite independently, with no special unity of thought in the meeting. But what was in the air was that they were not quite content with Sunday-school work as at present carried on. Only through such discontent could they attain to better things and she was confident that the schools in America, as in this country, would work out their own salvation. It was strongly felt that the sharp separation of school from church was a difficulty which must be met.

On the other hand, they saw the magnificent fruit of the American schools and of the work of such women as Mrs. Beattley and Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, and men equally devoted, in the meeting of the Young People's Religious Union, which was the grandest of the week. The meeting was held in an immense building, and every seat was filled. The President gave a splendid address on the three watchwords of the Union—"Truth, Worship, Service." He was followed by a lady who spoke on "Sunrise," and youth as the sunrise of life, and what Unitarianism should mean to their young people. She pleaded that they should be allowed to use their own methods and live their own life. Then came the Rev. W. W. Fenn, of Chicago, whose subject was "The Message of Unitarianism at Noon"; and then in place of Robert Collyer, who was unable to be present, the venerable Mary Livermore gave a most beautiful address on "Sunset" and the message of Unitarianism to those on whom the sun of life was going down. The whole was beautifully conceived, and showed a wonderful harvest of the strength of their school work.

She recognised that there would be need of great care lest the three sections—the School, the Young People's Union, and the Church—should go each too much on separate lines; while preserving their individuality, they must remember that with diversity of operations there was one spirit.

In conclusion, she suggested whether in this country, where too much was laid upon ministers in the demand of two sermons every Sunday, it might not be well to leave the evening free for the young people to gather and make a meeting of their own. That, she thought, might be a solution of their difficulty as to the drifting away of their young people. They must be made to feel that they had a place of their own in the church. They were quite able to work out their own salvation, and should be allowed to do so, as they themselves had desired to do when they were young.

The Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND said that he had not enough knowledge of English schools to draw useful comparison between them and American schools, but, so far as he knew, they were doing more in America in the way of uniform lessons. He recognised the danger that the school might become a rival or substitute for the church, but where the minister strongly felt the value of the church the children also were gathered in. Then there was danger that the school should take the place of religious education in the home, but the school must not be the substitute—it must be an aid to church and home. He felt more and more that it was a mistake not to systematise the teaching in their schools; there was too much helter-skelter teaching instead of some large plan prepared by minister and superintendent and teachers together. This was as much the minister's duty as his pulpit work. There were three main lines of teaching: (i.) They must teach the Bible, but with more system, so as to have time for other things; (ii.) Religious thought, faith, a careful understanding of what they themselves believed, talking things through between teacher and scholars on all the lines taken by religious thought; (iii.) Human duty in all the relations in which a child stands, to build up character. If this were done something valuable would be accomplished in the schools.

The Rev. FLORENCE BUCK, speaking of the fact that children came to one service only, and that the school service, said that the difficulty was more with the parents than the children; her own experience was that the children increasingly desired to come to the church service. It was true they might approach the school work on the two lines suggested; but was it not also true that they worked for the same ends, whether in a mission school gathering in the poorest children, or in schools for the children of the church? It was the same work of character-building, and the development of religious thought and life. It was most true that religion must be taught in the home; but how often it was not taught there, and this laid an added duty on the teacher. And if religion was taught in the home there was yet a vast field for the school, to give true ideas about the Bible, and their own faith; to teach the children to be tolerant of other faiths, but at the same time loyal to their own; to teach them to be sympathetic and kindly in their judgments, without being lax in their own principles; to teach them to see the disappearance of what people have been wont to reverence, without losing their own reverence. She had been deeply touched by the closing words of Miss Pritchard's address. It was of the greatest importance that between the child in the school and the adult in active work in the church, there should be an interval of training and experience, and that they found in the Young People's Societies. She thought it was good that the young people should have a service of their own, conducted among themselves. That might be held, with a brief service of worship afterwards, without a sermon, conducted by the minister. No work of the churches was more important than that of the schools, whether touching the poor or the better classes. It was work that called forth the highest abilities, the most careful thought, needing all the zeal, devotion and knowledge that were largely being given to it.

The Rev. E. S. ANTHONY then moved, and the Rev. W. HARRISON seconded a vote of thanks to the President, and Miss Pritchard and all who had contributed to the usefulness and success of the meeting; and Miss PRITCHARD having responded, the meeting closed.

THE heart that goes out of itself gets large and full of joy. This is the great secret of the inner life. We do ourselves the most good by doing something for others.—Horace Mann.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ON Wednesday morning, at half-past ten, a Communion service was held in Unity Church, Islington, conducted by the Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford, and the Rev. Joseph Wood, who delivered the address.

At half-past eleven the annual service of the Association was held, conducted by the Rev. Christopher J. Street, M.A., LL.B., who also preached the sermon. The collection amounted to £77 15s. 11d.

THE SERMON.

THE GIFT OF UNITARIANISM TO THE CENTURY.

"Thy God hath commanded thy strength strengthen, O God, that which Thou hast wrought for us."—Psalm lxviii. 28.

THIS is the closing year of a wonderful century, and it is also the seventy-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. These facts inevitably shape and direct our thoughts this morning.

In estimating the value of the century's life we need a proper sense of perspective, so that we may duly realise the importance of historic changes with which we have now become familiar, and at the same time refrain from attaching too much significance to disturbing movements of our own day. A century which has produced a Channing, an Emerson, and a Martineau, is not to be disparaged because in these latter days it has produced apostles of a trumpery ritualism and preachers of a forlorn hopelessness. It is true that of late there has been a surprising recrudescence of sacerdotalism; that the mercenary spirit has taken strange hold of our people and cursed us with the greed of gold; that the people are apathetic while designing politicians and hungry ecclesiastics prey upon their resources to aggravate class distinctions and endow sectarian institutions; that we are living in an age of wars and rumours of wars, when a passion of militarism seems to have settled on the nations even while they confer about arbitration and disarmament; that blind partisanship has dared to assail free speech in the pulpit and the press, on the platform and even in the home; that even now we are engaged on the odious task of suppressing free institutions among a conquered people, so that the old dream of civil and religious liberty all the world over seems further away from realisation than ever.

All this and much more which need not now be particularised is perceived and bitterly regretted by every shrewd and large-minded observer. But it is the close of the century, and a new one is about to dawn. We are at a transitional period, and all these deplorable signs of the times are evanescent, and in their very nature doomed to die. "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." What is Browning's word to the despondent?

> Grow old along with me!
> The best is yet to be,
> The last of life for which the first was made;
> Our times are in His hand
> Who saith "A whole I planned:
> Youth shows but half; trust God; see all, nor be afraid."

It is strange how, in our artificially marked periods of time, the close of the century is so often associated with a reactionary spirit. The first Christian century passed amid many forebodings and disturbing incidents. "Little children, it is the last hour," cried one of the voices of that day, "and as ye heard that Anti-Christ cometh, even now have there arisen many Anti-Christs, whereby we know that it is the last hour." But it was only the transition time from one age into another, accompanied by the birth-throes necessary for the evolution of a better spirit. Anti-Christ periodically visits the earth, and his reign is dreary; but happily it is brief, and Christ is born again from age to age, whereby the power of Anti-Christ is overthrown.

A study of the century's life under the guidance of the historic sense will speedily show how much there is to be thankful for in the remarkable progress which has been made in so many directions. No hundred years has been so prolific of general change for the better; indeed, the improvement has been so universal as to be almost incalculable. I might dwell on the conditions of the people's life to-day, and compare them with those of a hundred years ago, showing how opportunities of work and possibilities of comfort have been brought within the reach of nearly every honest and capable person; how men and women are more humanised by education and sympathy and equality of treatment; how the nation's welfare has been taken from the hands of an oligarchy, and entrusted to the people themselves; how restrictions on trade and the supply of food have been withdrawn; how slavery has been for the most part abolished; how moral offences, once lightly regarded, are now frowned upon and punished severely; how philanthropy and charity have shed their benign influence on every hand; how communities have set themselves to bring to their members health of body and of mind by the establishment of parks and baths, of libraries and museums. A hundred similar signs of progress might be noted, and yet we should by no means have exhausted the record.

But this is not my province to-day. Mine be the humbler task to recall to your attention some of the indications of the religious progress of the closing century, and to mark out the part which, in my opinion, Unitarianism, led by this Association, has played in that evolution.

When we are disposed to complain of the isolation to which, as Unitarians, we have been subjected by the ban of the Catholic and the Anglican, and now by that of our Nonconformist brethren from whom we might have hoped for better things, it may be well to recall the fact that when the century opened the profession of Unitarianism was altogether illegal. True, it was being preached in some of the Presbyterian and other chapels, sometimes avowedly, more often without giving it a name. True, Theophilus Lindsey resigned his preferment in the Church of England and established in Essex-street the first Unitarian Chapel as such in the country. True, in 1791 there had been founded a Unitarian Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge and the Practice of Virtue by the Distribution of Books, and in 1806 a Unitarian Fund had been established.

But all this was done in defiance of the law which definitely prohibited under penalties the maintenance of such opinions as we hold. It was not until 1813 that Unitarians were by legislative enactment brought within the scope of the Toleration Act. The obnoxious Conventicle and Five Mile Acts had been repealed in the previous year. In 1819 an Association for Protecting the Civil Rights of Unitarians was founded; and on May 26, 1825, the three Unitarian Societies were amalgamated under the name of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, under whose auspices we are assembled to-day. The American Unitarian Association was founded in the same year, and three years later the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed, so that civic offices opened the front as well as the back door to Unitarians thenceforward. Subsequently the Marriage and Registration Acts were passed; then the Dissenters' Chapels Act, the charter of our freedom, by means of which our historic chapels were secured to us. Oxford, at which the chief college for the education of our ministers is now maintained, led the way in opening the doors of the Universities to Nonconformists, and a few years later University tests were abolished. The Burials Act gave the right of Nonconformist services in the parish churchyard, and the recent amended Marriage Act made an attempt to give something like equal treatment to Churchmen and Dissenters.

Doubtless, much remains to be done; but when we reflect on the changes which have been brought to pass within a hundred years, the wonder is that so much has actually been accomplished in the time. That Unitarianism has survived at all in any organised form, in spite of so many drawbacks and hindrances, shows that it has an inner vitality which will not be denied. The central Association expended £6,061 18s. 11d. last year in carrying out its operations, not reckoning the Indian and Special Services Funds. Moreover, numerous District Societies with separate subscription lists and multifarious missionary operations have sprung up and done good service in many parts of the country.

What is this British and Foreign Association? Even at this late day, and occasionally in our own ranks, there seems some need for an explanatory statement on this head. The Association is not an Assembly of Churches, nor is it an Ecclesiastical Body in any sense. By its constitution it is simply a co-operative band of individuals who are agreed in desiring to diffuse the principles of Unitarian Christianity. It is thus distinctively a Theological Association; but its theology, though it stands for the pure and simple teaching of Jesus, unspoiled by the ecclesiastics and the creeds, does not commit the churches to which we belong. We are Unitarian members of Free Churches. Certainly, the Association, by way of fulfilling one of its functions, makes grants to Churches and ministers whose teaching is known to harmonise with that of Unitarians; and the Association would rightly withhold or withdraw it from them if they ceased to be Unitarian. But the congregations and ministers are not forced to receive grants, which as a rule are only given when asked for, and when they do receive them their independence is not interfered with. They manage their own affairs in their own way; all that the Association has to do with them is to determine whether they are managed in such a way as to promote the principles to which it is pledged.

But, it may be said, the Association has established churches. I am thankful to say it has, and parlous would have been our plight if it had not. This Association above all other agencies has been instrumental in creating new centres of free spiritual worship—Unitarian in the first instance, but entirely free to shape their own future. But for this organisation of Unitarian sentiment, many of our old congregations would have died out one by one by a natural process of decay, and no new living churches would have been formed to take their place. Freedom does not establish churches, but Faith does. And Faith implies theological conviction of some sort. No one glories in Freedom more than I, but when I hear it exalted above Faith I become impatient, and wonder why opportunity of service should be considered better than service itself. When we rejoice in Free Trade, we certainly think of the removal of the restraints on commerce as a blessing, but it is the Trade itself that we regard as important and wish to see developed. So when we demand Free Thought, we want freedom in order that we may think: the freedom is but a means to an end, and that end is high and holy thought. In like manner we follow our forefathers in maintaining Free Churches, but the Worship and Service associated with the thought of a Church are much more significant and fundamental than the Freedom. The advocates of Freedom, and freedom alone, have not built up our new congregations, but the men and women of Faith have; and the Unitarianism that finds its concentration here has been a missionary agency, to which alone is due the fact that our churches have increased in numbers, and that as one has waned here another has been created there.

Thus has the influence of Unitarian thought been maintained, by perpetual watchfulness, following the movements of popular thought, paying more attention to crowded towns than to deserted villages, and seizing every opportunity of speaking the word in season and planting the good seed in fruitful ground. In this way have the old wastes been repaired, and many new homes of worship established, not merely for speculative freedom but for the Unitarian Evangel. And wherever this gospel has gone it has carried with it the trust which it received from its fathers. Unitarianism has not been disloyal to its heritage, for it has said to every group of worshippers whom it has called together: "With freedom did Christ set us free. Stand fast therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage."

What then has been the gift which Unitarianism has made to the departing century, and through that to the coming age? I can only briefly summarise what seem to me to be the distinctive marks which our faith has made upon the time already fulfilled.

The first and most characteristic influence which Unitarianism has exercised has been to compel the recognition of a Unity of plan and purpose in the operations of Universal Providence; to make it plain that the Laws of Nature, consistent, reliable, and co-operant, are the chosen method of Divine Work; and so to enlarge for human minds the sphere of God's influence infinitely beyond the mere province of what is called "the Supernatural." God has been brought home to the consciousness as the greatest of all realities, immanent in all things, revealing Himself everywhere, the Soul of the universe. The "miracles" of interrupted sequence and arrested laws have ceased to awe, but the eternal miracle of Divine Constancy and Care breaks in upon the mind and hushes it to ineffable reverence. The Fatherhood and Love of God have been brought back to our age chiefly, as even our theological opponents admit, through the unwavering teaching of Unitarians. It is their lofty faith which has liberalised the doctrine of all the Churches and made them ashamed of some unworthy portions of their creeds, whose form, however, they still maintain. Eternal Punishment, Election and Reprobation, Substitutionary Sacrifice, have vanished from the prevailing theology like evil dreams.

And with this higher conception of God there has naturally come a correspondingly comprehensive view of the meaning and scope of human life. Man as the favoured child of God is no subject of scorn and self-abasement, but a centre of promise and possibility and eternal hope. In him there is the awakening sense of a spiritual relationship to God and a growing power of establishing a communion, by means of which he is enabled to rise to sublime heights of excellence. For the fulfilment of the prophecy writ large in his nature the few fleeting years of human life give no sufficient scope; but he cannot go where God is not, and God has sealed him for Himself. The life of earth is but a fragment of a Life Eternal whereunto he has been called. And hence has been developed the mighty faith, not only in the intrinsic worth of human life, but also in its continuity without a break through the change which we call Death. By this constructive process the pessimistic doctrines of the Fall of Man, Original Sin, and a Fixed and Final Fate for all, determined in a dramatic Judgment Day, have given place to a sublime faith in the patient and steady Ascent of Man, in the sacred trust given to every personality to make its conditions into instruments of progress, and in the Divine intention that through long schooling all souls shall ultimately be brought into willing union with God.

It was inevitable that with such high trust in the future of humanity, Unitarians should be foremost in good works, and take an active interest in the progressive life of the community. Such a faith was bound to work; and so men and women of our churches have taken their share, and often much more than their proportionate share, in the great social, philanthropic, and educational movements of their time. Sometimes it has been matter for wonder to our critics why we trouble ourselves to work in so many ways of public usefulness, why we cannot concentrate our attention upon our churches and find all the opportunity we need within our own household of faith. But it is just the breadth of our faith which compels us to seek a larger communion, to expect others to sink their differences in matters of speculative belief and work with us for practical purposes of social amelioration, to help our brethren and be helped by them in turn along the cheerful road of everlasting life. Hence it is that Unitarians have been such firm friends of education, such ready participants in the responsibilities of civic life, such leaders in the crusade against impurity and intemperance, such patient toilers among the poor and outcast. They have tried to express in action their sublime faith in the Divine call for human brotherhood and co-operation.

Again, by a reverent use of its inherited freedom and loyalty to truth, Unitarianism has handed on the principle of the Open Trust, and given it a deeper significance than our Presbyterian and Independent forefathers knew. It has repudiated all bondage of creeds, however correct they might seem, and condemned all restrictions on liberty of thought and speech. Its congregations have been assured in their rightful independence by recognition of the fact that they are simply combinations of individuals united by spiritual sympathies for the Worship of God and Service of Man, and its preachers have been encouraged to deliver their souls with bold faith. Men are taught among us to trust the truth, and seek ever fresh light from God. A welcoming hand is held out to Science, and from the new philosophy of Evolution there is no shrinking. If it be of God, it will prevail, and cannot be overthrown; if of man, its day will be short.

Following this spirit, there has been a fearless study of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, a lead being given to Christendom in this direction. If to-day the old superstition of the Sacred Books has almost vanished from educated life, if our generation has been blessed with a reasonably understood and interpreted Bible, the fact is due most of all to the patient labours of early Unitarian scholars who pleaded for a new translation, and did their best to supply the want, until Convocation of the Established Church was itself constrained to move and produce the Revised Version of the Scriptures, which in itself has done so much to dissipate prejudice and idolatry. The insistence upon the use of reason and critical principle in dealing with the documents of the Bible as with those of any other literature prepared the way for Colenso, and so for the Higher Criticism which has made the old books live again. The Bible, indeed, has been within this century opened for the first time to the human mind; it can be read to-day with intelligence such as was impossible in days gone by. As the superstitious reverence for the letter of the Scriptures vanishes, the natural love for all that is ennobling and enkindling in the spiritual guidance of its writers and heroes immeasurably increases.

From this careful and unbiassed examination of the ancient records has come, in consequence, a truer historical sense of the part played in the world's life by the greatest of the prophets, Jesus—called indeed the Christ, but shown in fact to be greater in his own personality than any office could make him. Again it is admitted by our opponents that they have to thank Unitarianism for bringing out into vivid relief the historic personality of the Man of Nazareth, which was in danger of being overlaid by the dogmatic traditions of the Church. The fact is that Unitarianism is a return to Christian simplicity, and that it has brought into the world's life in these later days the fragrant breath of a gracious personality, whose identity had almost been lost under his ecclesiastical trappings. The human Jesus has been restored to the Christian Church; and the humble instrument has been the heretic who is denied the right to use the name of the Teacher whom he loves and venerates above all the sons of men. And as the simple humanity of Jesus emerges from the clouds of tradition and unwise adulation, the beauty and significance of his life become more evident, and the power of a human example becomes established as a source of encouragement and inspiration. The Son of Man is seen, in his ideal form, to be identical with the Son of God, and the word of hope is strengthened into promise when it is seen what man has been and may be.

This spirit of reverent investigation has further brought with it a deep sympathy with the religious aspirations of the world; a determination to minimise the differences which divide men and seek out the fundamental principles which unite. Religion, under the pioneer guidance of such liberal teachers as Theodore Parker, has been shown to be the universal heritage of mankind. No faith is false, however it may be mistaken in its way of giving utterance to deep and natural feeling. All peoples share the Divine blessing, and to each God's voice speaks in appropriate tones. As the great faiths of the world are compared, a surprising unity of conception emerges; and while the devotees of each may glory most in their own, they are constrained to recognise that strength and beauty are in God's sanctuary everywhere. The comparative study of religious developments has widened human charity. The Bible is made to take its relative place alongside the other religious Scriptures of the world, though in doing so its superiority seems to us most clearly evident. Christianity is seen to be but one of the great streams of religious thought and life. Though its current is stronger and its expanse broader than the rest, all the rivers are hurrying on to the great ocean of Truth in which their waters will ultimately be merged and blended.

If I have claimed too much for Unitarianism in maintaining that it is chiefly responsible for the dissemination of such ennobling principles, it will not at least be denied that for these and such as these it firmly stands, and that a century ago there was scarcely a voice in the wilderness to proclaim so helpful a gospel. And if in the last hundred years so great an advance has been made, what may we not dare to hope of the coming century? Surely we have ground of right for generous dreams of the coming age. Some of our eager anticipations may be extravagant; many of our earlier hopes have already been doomed to disappointment. The young enthusiast of "Locksley Hall"

> Saw the Vision of the world and all the wonder that would be.
> Men, my brothers, men the workers, ever reaping something new,
> That which they have done but earnest of the things that they shall do.

He dreamed a glorious dream of peace and brotherhood, when

> The war drum throbbed no longer, and the battle flags were furled,
> In the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the world; and his faith ventured upon the utterance—

Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

But Sixty Years Afterwards the old enthusiasms had largely died away; the visions had failed of realisation; the old hopes and faiths no longer sustained the tired spirit. The fires of youth were spent.

Cold upon the dead volcano sleeps the gleam of dying day.

The prophetic voice was bereft of kindly promise, and little was heard but grumblings and forebodings of distress—

Noises of a current narrowing, not the music of a deep, as he himself half realises. But even amid the wrecks of earlier hopes there yet remains a vestige of the old faith, chastened and warned by experience.

Forward then; but still remember how the course of Time will swerve,
Crook and turn upon itself in many a backward streaming curve.

It is a useful, and for us a timely word. We need it especially in these dark days of temporary reaction, when we seem to be caught in an eddy and whirled back from the main stream of progress toward the gloomy past which we thought we had left behind for ever. But though we may circle miserably for a while, and feel ourselves impotent for good when so much needs to be done, do not doubt that we shall be caught again ere long by the force of the continuous current, and borne forward to a nobler destiny. We must not permit these liberal dreams to pass away. Rather be ours the task to strive to realise them as far as we may in the world's life of to-day. The greater the temporary reaction, so much the more need of every effort we can put forth. And if the time is to be redeemed, and the next generation truly served, there is no higher task open to any of us than to cherish and enforce our Unitarian gospel of the kingdom of heaven which cometh not with observation, but yet is to be established on earth in the hearts and lives of the children of God.

Before the annual meeting, the President, Mr. Charles W. Jones, J.P., entertained the delegates and representatives of District Associations and Societies at luncheon at the Savoy Hotel.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the President, Mr. Charles W. Jones, J.P., in the chair.

An opening hymn having been sung, the PRESIDENT called upon the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, as secretary, to submit the report.

Mr. BOWIE, who on rising received a very warm welcome from the meeting, said that the Unitarians of America, at their great meetings at Boston, had charged him to bring their best wishes for the success of the work in England, and congratulations on what had been accomplished. He then submitted the minutes of the last annual meeting, which were signed by the President, and the annual report:—

COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The report opened with the following passage:—"It is with feelings of profound veneration and gratitude for a gifted and noble life that the Committee record the death, on Jan. 11, 1900, of James Martineau, the oldest and most distinguished member of the Association. Dr. Martineau preached the Annual Sermon so long ago as 1834, and again in 1869. For several years before his death he was in the habit of calling personally at Essex Hall at the beginning of the year for the purpose of paying his annual subscription, and his support of the Association and its work was always loyal and generous. His lofty character and unique intellectual gifts, so modestly held, won for him during his life-time world-wide recognition; and on his death the secular and religious press of the whole country, without distinction of sect or party, bore eloquent testimony to the magnificent services he had rendered to the highest and best religious thought and life of the nineteenth century."

The record of losses during the year, through the death of other warm friends and generous supporters of the Association, was unusually long, and included special mention of Miss Anna Swanwick, Sir Henry Tate, Bart., Mrs. Thomas Colfox, Sir Philip and Lady Manfield, Mr. J. S. Mathers and others.

MISSION WORK.

Grants were made during the year for various purposes to 171 churches, to three Unions for the support of District Ministers and to Postal Missions. Among the newer movements to which help had been given mention was made of Burton-on-Trent, Newton Abbot and Stratford-on-Avon, and of the good promise of the new church buildings at Ashton-under-Lyne and Narborough-road, Leicester, also of the renovations at Chester, Ipswich and Mountpottinger.

In Australia it was reported that the Melbourne congregation was making progress under the ministry of the Rev. R. H. Lambley, and that the Committee proposed to give substantial support to the Church at Sydney. The Rev. W. Jellie had been appointed to take charge of the new movement at Auckland, New Zealand, with good prospect of success. Hopeful accounts had also been received of the movement at Hobart Town, Tasmania. It was reported with regret that Mr. M. Simonfi had been obliged by failure of health to relinquish his studies as Hungarian student at Manchester College, Oxford. At Copenhagen Mr. Theo. Berg had continued the issue of his little paper "Det glade Budskab," and a Unitarian Brotherhood had been formed. Mention was made of the secretary's retirement next November from the London School Board after twelve years of service, which would set him free for more extensive visiting of churches throughout the country.

PUBLICATIONS.

Among the publications of the year had been the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's Essex Hall Lecture, "The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity," the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Back to Jesus," passages from Dr. Southwood Smith's "Divine Ordination of Death" with a brief biography, and a new edition of the late Rev. C. J. Perry's "Spiritual Perspective." The Committee also issued for private circulation a series of "Addresses, Prayers, and Hymns," by the late Dr. Sadler, and published for the Rev. Walter Lloyd his "Story of Protestant Dissent and English Unitarianism." A number of Unitarian pamphlets in Welsh were published, and in addition to other English pamphlets, a useful musical index to the Essex Hall Hymnal, prepared by Mr. H. Barnard, of Kilburn, and Mr. John Harrison, of Brixton. During the year 1,763 books and 87,219 pamphlets were gratuitously distributed to congregations, ministers, postal missions and private inquirers.

McQUAKER FUND.

In addition to the work of lecturing and maintaining congregations in Scotland, a selection of books were presented to a number of public and college libraries in Scotland; it was determined to offer a scholarship of £100 a year, tenable for three years, for a Scotch graduate, willing to enter the Unitarian ministry, to study at Manchester College, Oxford; and it was also resolved to offer copies of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "God and the Soul" to divinity students, and to invite essays on the subject, for the ten best of which Dr. Martineau's "Types" and "Study of Religion" should be given as prizes. The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke lectured at Aberdeen, Edinburgh and Glasgow on "Religion in Literature" and "Religion in Life," and also preached in the three University cities.

INDIA.

The Rev. S. F. Williams reported that there were special reasons for the maintenance of the Unitarian mission station in the Khasi Hills, but that in India generally the best method would be to strengthen the Brahmo movement. For this the Manchester College Scholarship would be most effective, and great service was rendered by the wide distribution of liberal religious literature.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

The special services of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke had been continued during the autumn, but had unfortunately been interrupted by a severe attack of influenza. Since Easter of the present year, Mr. Brooke had been able to preach again, and from the end of May till the beginning of July was preaching at Essex Church.

MEETINGS AND DEPUTATIONS.

Particulars were given of the autumnal meeting at Bristol and of deputations of the Association that had attended the annual meetings of various associations in the country. The Revs. Charles Hargrove and W. Copeland Bowie had been deputed to attend the International Conference of Unitarians at Boston in May of the present year.

FINANCE.

Collections for the Association were made by 183 congregations, an increase of thirteen on the previous year, but in the subscription list there was a net loss of £17 2s. 6d., many serious losses having been partially made good by new and increased subscriptions.

At the end of 1898, the treasurer had a balance in hand of £76 4s. 10d. During the year 1899 annual subscriptions yielded £1,732 6s., congregational collections £549 11s. 7d., donations £340 19s., dividends, interest, and rent, £924 14s. 5d., and various special sources of income £121 19s. 4d. The book department yielded £1,245 16s. 11d. In order to meet the liabilities for the year £100 was transferred from the investment account to the general fund. The total receipts for 1899, exclusive of the balance brought forward from 1898, amounted to £4,915 7s. 3d. In 1898 the treasurer was able to transfer £250 to the investment account, but in 1899 the actual expenditure exceeded that of the previous year by £534 15s. 8d.; and so, though the income was larger by £98 16s. 3d. and the balance carried forward at the end of the year £52 13s. 8d. less, it was necessary, as mentioned above, to transfer £100 from the investment account to the general fund. The expenditure for the year included £3,054 5s. paid in grants of money to congregations and missionaries and in gifts of books and pamphlets to postal missions, churches, and private individuals—an increase of £422 1s. 10d. on the year 1898. In connection with the book department, the sum of £1,001 5s. 11d. was expended, an increase of £82 0s. 2d. on the previous year. The office and book-room salaries amounted to £701 1s.; maintenance expenses (including the payment of £100 to the Essex Hall trustees, the printing and postage of the annual report and list of members, general advertising, stationery, and postage of correspondence) required £269 3s. 6d.; other special expenditure, £42 5s. 6d.; making in all £5,063 0s. 11d. for the year. The balance carried to 1900 was £23 11s. 2d.

It was further noted that in the present year the losses by death had already been very serious, and that consequently there was all the greater need for fresh subscriptions.

Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, the treasurer, in submitting the annual statement of accounts, said that he must always regard the annual subscriptions as the most important part of the revenue, and it was a blot on their report that subscriptions were diminishing. For the present year they would have to report a further loss of £164, only a trifling part of which had been recovered by new subscriptions. They must get the younger generation of Unitarians to take up the work. He was not despondent, for the London Bazaar had recently shown what could be accomplished, which had been a great success financially, and even more so socially. There had been an increase in the congregational collections on Association Sunday, chiefly due to the collection made at the new Ullet-road Church in Liverpool. The increase in expenses had been partly due to their secretary and to Mr. Green. The work of the Association had considerably increased, and the untiring energy and knowledge of character, which had gained for Mr. Bowie the chairmanship of one of the most important Committees of the London School Board, had made him an invaluable help to their Association, and they would all be glad to offer that slight recognition of his services. He also spoke warmly of the value of Mr. Green's services. He strongly urged that ministers and members of their congregations should actively interest themselves in obtaining new subscriptions and especially from the younger members of their families and churches.

The PRESIDENT moved the adoption of the report and accounts, and said that while he never thought much of a society without a debt, he objected to any Association that sold its investments. Manchester College, Oxford, had for many years had growing debits in several of its accounts, and it seemed to be necessary to sell out investments. But twelve trustees of the College had sent to him as treasurer £1,200, to wipe out all the debits. They called it their New Century Fund, which would enable the College to enter the new century free from debt. It was an example he commended to other societies. Referring to the losses by death, he mentioned Dr. Martineau's two Association sermons in 1834 and 1869, and the interest there would be in comparing them, and then made special mention of Mr. H. J. Cook, of Liverpool, a man of sterling character and remarkable modesty, who in a quiet way had done almost more work for the Unitarian body in his district than any other man. With Mr. W. J. Lamport he established the Liverpool District Missionary Association, and only those connected with the Association and the churches it had founded knew the difficulties they went through, and how much had been accomplished. Having referred to the special services and specially commended the series of consecutive services in one place, he concluded by reading the last sentences of the Report, reaffirming the principles and ideals of the Association, and appealing for fresh support from all loyal Unitarians and all who cared for liberty and progress in the religious thought and life of the present time.

The Rev. L. DE BEAUMONT KLEIN seconded the resolution, and said he was convinced there was much in it for which to be thankful. He welcomed the treasurer's appeal, urging them to attract the young to the great and noble work in which they were engaged. The grants to churches were made with great discrimination, as helps to freedom, and not a curb to freedom in any sense. Their publications also were of great service. Their work was for unity in true freedom. That was the question of the hour, how to work for unity, and yet at the same time for freedom.

Mr. GROSVENOR LEE asked whether the treasurer had made direct appeals to the local treasurers to increase the number of subscribers.

The TREASURER replied that they had all been written to, but with very little response.

The Rev. C. J. STREET said that at Bolton the local treasurer had been very active, and had obtained a number of new subscribers from their younger members.

The resolution was then unanimously adopted.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD moved:—

That the best thanks of this Meeting be given to the President, the Officers, the Council, and the Executive Committee, for their valuable services during the past year, and that the following be the respective appointments for the coming year:—President: Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. Treasurer: Oswald Nettlefold, Esq. Secretary: Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Solicitor: Howard Young, Esq., LL.B. Trustees: S. S. Tayler, Esq., David Martineau, Esq., J.P., W. Blake Odgers, Esq., Q.C., Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P. Auditors: J. Sudbery, Esq., E. F. Grundy, Esq., A. Wilson Bristow, Esq. For Council: (see list in Annual Report). Committee, in addition to the President, Ex-President and Treasurer: Mr. G. L. Bristow, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Mr. Charles Fenton, Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., Miss Lawrence, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. J. F. Schwann, J.P., Miss Tagart, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler.

In doing so he said that all those who were connected with local societies knew how much the churches were indebted to the managers of the Association. For himself he was not, perhaps, so much of a Unitarian as many others, at least he was not double-dyed by birth and conviction, as some of them were. He was not by birth a Unitarian, but by conviction he was. While he admired Unitarians with all his heart, he was not sure that he admired Unitarianism so much. Yet he was glad to pay his tribute to the good work done by the Association, and thankfully to recognise the absolute impartiality with which its grants were made. Whatever differences of thought there might be, if only good work was being done the Association had given help impartially and with liberality. He was a great believer in the National Conference, but however great the future of that Conference might be, it need not be in any way antagonistic to the Association. There was ample room for both societies. He was glad to belong to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, as a society of individuals engaged in a theological propaganda, which for many years would have a great work to do, both in the publication of books and as a missionary society. But he was glad also that they had in the National Conference a separate organisation through which their churches could be drawn together and find a united voice. The necessity for the Association would grow with the growth of the Conference. As the churches came into closer co-operation it would strengthen the work of the Association. He trusted that in the future, as in the past, there would be the most cordial relations of co-operation between the Conference and the Association.

Mr. G. W. CHITTY seconded the motion, and emphasised the need at the present time of individual and collective earnestness. If, as Mr. Street had said in his sermon, theirs was a Theological Association, its theology was of the broadest. It was no seventh-day theology, but the expression of a living faith, which did its best to inculcate in them their duties as citizens. The great bond of sympathy among Unitarians was their common earnestness and their desire to fulfil the duties of citizenship. The efforts of the Association were always on the side of national progress.

The PRESIDENT then moved, and Mr. EDWIN CLEPHAN seconded:—

That the hearty welcome of this Meeting be given to the Representatives of affiliated and kindred Associations and Societies, with an expression of its sympathy with the good work which they are severally doing for the maintenance and extension of the principles of Unitarian Christianity:—East Cheshire Union, Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, M.A.; Eastern Union, Mr. I. M. Wade; Irish Non-Subscribing Association, Rev. Alex. Ashworth; Liverpool District Association, Mr. Richard Robinson; London District Society, Mr. G. H. Clennell, Mr. H. Epps; London and S.E.C. Provincial Assembly, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.; Manchester District Association, Rev. Dendy Agate, Mr. G. H. Leigh; Midland Christian Union, Rev. J. C. Street, Rev. A. A. Charlesworth; North-Midland Association, Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., Mr. J. C. Warren; Northumberland and Durham Association, Rev. A. Harvie; Scottish Unitarian Churches, Rev. Henry Williamson; South Wales Association, Rev. W. J. Phillips; South East Wales Society, Rev. E. Robinson Hughes; Southern Unitarian Association, Mr. J. Cogan Conway; Western Union, Rev. H. Shaen Solly, Rev. F. W. Stanley; Yorkshire Unitarian Union, Mr. E. B. Lupton.

Mr. Clephan spoke of the importance of their being acquainted with the work of the various district Associations, and referring to the falling-off of numbers in many of their old chapels, as compared with the early years when he had known them, he said that the same complaint was made in other quarters, and they might adopt the words of the Rev. W. Cuff, President of the Baptist Union, who had said that the great need was that the hearts of the people should be permeated by the Holy Spirit. It was thus an individual matter with each one, that their life might be filled with the true spirit. At the next annual meeting he hoped the various local Associations would be able to report what had been done, not so much to build chapels as to fill them.

The motion having been adopted, the Rev. H. S. TAYLER, in the absence of the Rev. H. S. Solly, responded, and from personal experience in East Cheshire bore testimony to the value of the Association's work.

The PRESIDENT moved :—

That this meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association extends its warmest welcome to the Representatives of Liberal thought from abroad; and hereby conveys an expression of its gratitude, esteem, and goodwill to those who, in all parts of the world, are earnestly labouring for the spread of religious truth and freedom; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Foreign Correspondents of the Association in America, Australia, Belgium, Cape Colony, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Iceland, India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland, and Tasmania.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT, in seconding, said that, from time to time, they received letters from distant parts of the world, often very touching in character, on account of the faith of the writers that there existed in this country a potent and sympathetic body to which they could look for aid in their work. That called them to a fresh sense of their responsibility. They felt the work was necessary and they must be glad to have a share in it. He wished they could convey to the people abroad a word of cordial gratitude to them for being so faithful amid circumstances such as would daunt any but the bravest hearts. To themselves, with their better means, it must be an encouragement to go on.

Professor N. P. GILMAN, of Meadville, responded, and expressed the cordial good wishes of American Unitarians to their English brethren.

A vote of thanks to the preacher and to the congregation of Unity Church, Islington, and to other friends in London for their hospitality, was moved by the PRESIDENT, and seconded by the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS. Mr. STREET responded, and the meeting then adjourned for tea.

PUBLIC MEETING.

Later in the evening the PRESIDENT again took the chair, and in the name of the Association welcomed the secretary on his return from America.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE thanked the meeting for the great cordiality of their welcome, and said he had a very delightful time as representative of the Association in America. In every city he visited he was welcomed with overflowing hospitality and kindness. He had preached at Washington, Chicago, Ottawa, and Boston, and had found great earnestness and faith in the mission of Unitarians. Some churches were struggling with difficulties, but some were stronger than any they had in this country, and some also more beautiful. The younger men, on whom the burden of the work fell, were very hopeful about the future. The meetings at Boston had been extremely successful. He had never seen such large meetings of Unitarians. The enthusiasm with which England was greeted at those great meetings was very striking. Throughout the country he had been struck by a widespread feeling of sympathy with the highest aspirations of England and a feeling that any misfortune to England would be a calamity to the civilised world. He had also visited a large number of schools and colleges, and had been struck by the wisdom of those who had organised a great school system throughout the States, to which was largely due the stability and the great opportunities of that great country. He was grateful for the opportunity of seeing and learning so much.

The PRESIDENT then delivered his address :—

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

When we think over the events of the past twelve months, the one which seems to overshadow all others is the loss of our revered leader, Dr. Martineau. Full of years and honour he passed away. I will not attempt to vie with those who have so eloquently spoken of his life and character, but would humbly lay my poor tribute on the grave of that great man.

My walk in life seldom brought me in contact with him personally, but I have a vivid recollection of the effect he produced upon my young mind when I was privileged to see and hear him at meetings in Liverpool before he left for London. I can well remember the feeling that he inspired, not unmixed with awe, and now that he has passed from our ken, I can recall the stateliness and dignity with which he addressed his gracious words to his audience.

There is one point I should like to impress upon some of you, especially those of the younger generation. There is a general impression that his writings are too profound and difficult to be understood by people of ordinary intelligence and education. This is, no doubt, true of the bulk of his work, especially that relating to Philosophy, but it is by no means true of the whole of his writings. Anyone of average intelligence will, for instance, be amply repaid for reading a little volume recently published, entitled "Faith and Self-Surrender." If I tell you that the book consists of four sermons, do not be discouraged. Sermons, I am well aware, are as a rule dull reading to the average man or woman; but there are exceptions to every rule, and these sermons of Dr. Martineau's are a very striking exception indeed. The book is a small one, easily carried in the pocket, and would prove a very interesting and ennobling companion on a summer holiday. Just to mention one other instance, out of many, where his writing is easy of comprehension, read the chapter in the "Seat of Authority on Religion," entitled "Theories of the Person of Jesus," and you will find it not only intelligible, but also intensely interesting, even to an ordinary reader.

Of Dr. Martineau's philosophy I know nothing, but of the influence of his life and teaching on the religious thought of his day I know much. We who had the good fortune to be born into his clear faith are grateful to him for holding it up to us in all its purity and simplicity. But what of those, an immense host, who have been rescued from the torments of doubt and difficulty and filled with high ideals of faith, duty and love? Storm-tossed mariners on the sea of life, he piloted them into a safe haven of refuge by the clear guidance of his matchless teaching. His philosophical theories may be upset. His criticisms may be gainsayed, but his influence upon the religious tendencies of the age will be felt, unconsciously perhaps, but none the less truly, for generations to come.

An incident of striking interest, though not connected with us, has occurred in the Church of Rome. Nothing could have happened more calculated to waken us up to a sense of things as they are. We are prone to think and say that after all the Churches are all very much the same, working for the same end, though in different ways—a difference of method, not of spirit. We were, therefore, somewhat startled when we read the correspondence between Cardinal Vaughan and Dr. Mivart. We rubbed our eyes and looked again. Could this be at the end of the nineteenth century? It was an anachronism. But why were we surprised? What right had we to expect anything else? Where, and when, had we seen any sign that this Church had adapted itself to modern thought or modern ideas? It always has been perfectly consistent; the spirit to-day is the same that consigned Galileo to a dungeon 350 years ago. Why was not Dr. Mivart cast into prison? Not because the wish was absent, but the power was gone; not because the Church has relaxed its stern decrees, but because, thank God, the Civil power is above the Ecclesiastical. The policeman is more powerful than the priest. There is no half-way—no compromise. The heretic must either bow down to the Church and sign a recantation of his heresies or he must pay the penalty. And what a terrible penalty to him! Not only exclusion from his Church, but from Heaven itself; for we must not forget that the powers dealing with him still claim to hold the keys of heaven. Dying, he is refused the consolations of the sacraments of the Church. Dead, his poor body is treated with contumely, and denied burial in consecrated ground. What a terrible sentence this was for him and for his family and friends, we in this room can hardly appreciate. It would not trouble any one of us much, for whatever differences we may have on other matters, on one point we are all of the same mind and faith—that no power on earth can come between the soul and its Creator. And so in spite of all he suffered from the cruel consistency of his Church, as this great Seeker after Truth breathed his last, we can hear the far-off echo of those words the Master told us of—"Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

It would be rather interesting to picture what would have happened had Dr. Mivart belonged to another more modern Church, if I may do so without disrespect. Let us imagine the scientist feeling some qualms of conscience, and calling upon the Primate for advice. He describes his difficulties, expresses his wish to remain a faithful son of the Church, but does not see how he can do so in face of the Creeds, to which he formerly swore allegiance. He will probably be told to make his mind quite easy, is assured that no notice will be taken of any articles he chooses to write in the magazines, such things are simply ignored. The Church is so free and tolerant he may write anything he likes without any fear of being called to account. You will remember that the Primate himself was once counted amongst the heretics. About forty years ago he joined a small body of Broad Churchmen in publishing a volume of Essays which created considerable sensation at the time; Liberal Christians thought that at last a great Reform was at hand, that now something would be done to bring the teaching of the Church into line with modern knowledge and modern thought. On the other hand, the more orthodox section of the Church was shocked and pained, and there was some talk of prosecutions for heresy. But the Church, always wise in its generation, made no sign. He was a schoolmaster then, therefore a greater danger to the faith than any mere scientific man. Was he excommunicated? On the contrary, he rose in due course to the head of the Church.

Another incident which shows how lenient the Church is even to its own clergy occurred only last November. A well-known dignitary of the Church wrote an article entirely disposing of the doctrine of the Atonement from an historical, scientific, and moral point of view, an article so well written and so conclusive that any of our ministers wishing to preach on the subject cannot do better than quote it in extenso. It did not appear in the Guardian or the Church Times, but was one of a series written by Dissenters and others in a weekly organ of the Nonconformist bodies. Was he called to account? Was he prosecuted for heresy? Not at all. No one dreamt of such a thing. He remains undisturbed in his deanery, one of the chiefest ornaments of his Church, a most popular preacher and writer, his books probably more read than those of any other Church clergyman of the day. Lately his name was mentioned with general approval as a possible candidate for a vacant Bishopric.

Learning all this, the Scientist, much relieved, might go away with a comfortable feeling that in this Church even a priest (let alone a layman) may think what he likes, say what he likes, and do what he likes. But here he would be mistaken. He goes too far. A clergyman of the Church of England may think what he likes and say what he likes, but there are many things that he may not do. For instance, amongst other things, he may not burn candles excepting for the purposes of illumination; he may not wear vestments more gorgeous than the Rubric allows; he may not stand with his back to his congregation; he may not use incense except for the purposes of fumigation after his congregation has left. If he does any of these things he will be called to account and incur pains and penalties, including possible imprisonment.

Last October an article appeared in the Nineteenth Century magazine, followed by a letter to The Times, from a writer whom we are always glad to welcome whether it be in the realms of Theology or Romance, or a judicious blending of the two. These were again followed by two letters in the Liverpool Daily Post. These called forth a number of replies, which, if they were interesting, were certainly not encouraging. One especially, from the most daring of our Broad Church clergymen in Liverpool, if it proved anything, only showed how fruitless it is to expect any help towards reform from any members of that branch of the Church. If the realisation of the New Reform she asks for will satisfy Mrs. Ward and enable her to rejoin the Church which she has left with such evident reluctance, we all shall wish her "God Speed," and rejoice with her when she succeeds; but I hardly think it would satisfy any of us so far as to enable us to follow her. But whether such a Reform would be satisfactory or not, it seems fruitless to consider, for is there the slightest chance of its coming about?

We most of us have some dream of an open door, of a Universal Church to which all may belong. I have a firm conviction that it will come, that it has come much nearer during the century now passing away; but it will be a Church of toleration, not inclusion. Just as I believe that the object of all Social Reform should be, not a dead level of position and means, but an equal chance for all, followed by mutual consideration and respect of the highest for the lowest, and the lowest for the highest, so I believe that the future of the Church is not uniformity, not the watering down of creeds until they become so colourless that no one can object to them, but a mutual respect for each other's opinions, acknowledging that after all it is Life not Belief that constitutes a man a Christian. Those words which the writer of the Fourth Gospel puts into the mouth of Jesus, "In my Father's house are many mansions," seem to me to describe the City of God which we may all hope for. In that City there will be gradations from the stately Cathedral to the modest Meeting House, but the dwellers in the City will all belong to the one Universal Church of God.

We are so proud, and rightly so, of our freedom that we are wont to imagine that it is freedom that binds us together. I don't think it is. We have certainly no written creed, but there is a certain uniformity of belief amongst us and a toleration which helps us to live together in comparative harmony. It is perfectly right to band ourselves together for certain work as free churches, but in the Church of God will always be found those who can live better under creeds which others have formulated for them. These free and creed-bound Churches must learn to live together in harmony and mutual respect before the hope of an all embracing Church can be realised.

We may, indeed, look forward with some degree of hope when a Bishop* of the Established Church says he seems to see a day when doctrinal differences which now separate English-speaking Christians will no longer be held as insuperable barriers to union, when men will be content to rely for their spiritual union less exclusively upon dogmatic definitions and more on filial piety and the spirit of Christian charity. In the meantime, what of the separate Churches which are some day to be grouped into one harmonious whole? All the Churches have their ideals of what their work is: what is our ideal of a Church?

Again I will quote a Bishop† as his words carry infinitely more weight than anything I can say. This is his ideal:—

> A Church that can go forth courageously and face the world as it is, believing that God's revelation of Himself is continually being made, a Church fitted for free men, training them in knowledge and reverence, afraid of nothing, receptive of new impulses, proving all things and ever ready to give a reason for its principles.

Could there be a nobler or higher ideal of what a Church should be? And I say it not in a boasting spirit but in all humbleness and thankfulness, does it not exactly describe the principles upon which our Church is founded? Has not our Church gone forth, does it not still go forth courageously and face the world as it is? Are not our ministers always reminding us that God's revelation of Himself is still going on around us, interpreting it to us with all the faith and knowledge that is in them? Can you imagine a Church better fitted for free men, and does it not labour unceasingly to train its adherents in knowledge and reverence? Of what is our Church afraid excepting of that enemy to all Church life—indifference? Receptive of new impulses. When has it closed its door to any influence for good? Proving all things—nay, it has been blamed for not taking anything for granted but accepting nothing the truth of which has not been proved up to the hilt; ever ready to give a reason for its principles—yes, and never accepting any principles for which it cannot give a reason.

If this is true, and who shall gainsay it, have we not need to be thankful, and ought we not to show our thankfulness by working for the establishment and extension of our Church? We sometimes lament the smallness of our numbers; but now I get on to dangerous ground. If we want to increase our numbers, we are told that we only care to fill our chapels, and that this is an unworthy motive. Well, there is some consolation in small numbers, if we can believe what we have heard so often lately—namely, that minorities are always in the right.

I must be honest and confess that I do want to fill our chapels, not by any unworthy means, not by any compromise or by abating one jot of our freedom or devotion to the truth as it appears to us, not by relaxing our insistence upon absolute sincerity in matters relating to religion, but by inspiring our adherents with a deeper faith in our work, and a larger interest in things appertaining to the spirit. If those who have been born into our Church had taken as much interest in her welfare as they have in politics, literature, art, &c., how different her position would be to-day. If in every class, from the humblest worker to the Cabinet Minister, all had cared for their Church above all other things, do you think we should now be bemoaning the smallness of our numbers? Don't misunderstand me; I am not saying this by way of complaint, but of encouragement. We have those amongst us, thank God, who no matter how they are immersed in politics or business and the affairs of the world, always find time to devote to the affairs of our Church. And what a power they are for good! It is a great consolation to see how much even a mere handful of faithful workers can do to raise and establish Congregational work, and I would appeal to those who have done and are doing so much for our Church, not to be discouraged, but to persevere, and hand down the torch of free and enlightened Christianity undimmed to the generations that are to come.

We are frequently told that it is our duty to send our sons into the ministry. I don't see how we can do that, but we can do this. We can be careful not to discourage them, and we can encourage them in every way by advice and example to take a deep and reverent interest in all our Church work. Let us do all we can to make them feel that whilst we sympathise with them in all healthy enjoyment, in their interests and pleasures in the world at large, we know that they will find that unselfish work for others, far from interfering with these things will add a zest to life; preventing its pleasures from palling as otherwise they are too prone to do. The great danger which our Church, in common with all others, is suffering from at present, is indifference. We constantly lament the loss of our young people, and speak as if this were felt peculiarly by our Church; but when I talk with others I find that they make just the same complaint. When we hear that so and so has left one of our chapels for some reason, marriage for instance, or for no apparent reason, I should not mind half so much if I found that he or she had become attached to some other Church, no matter what persuasion it was of; the pity of it is that so many desert ours and other Churches and then abandon all connection with outward religion.

There was much talk some years ago of the want of organisation amongst us. I must say, for myself, that I think no good, but rather harm, would come of any attempt to organise our Church into any sort of system. We shall do better to rely upon Association, and of that I think we have a great deal which is most useful, and would be much more so if it were better and more heartily supported.

It seems to me that our Provincial Assemblies, our District Missions, and, above all, our British and Foreign Unitarian Association supply what is required for the working of the Church. What we want is mutual interest and help where required, not a fusing of all congregations into one body with a common purse; that I think would be a great mistake. I should object to anything which interfered with the complete independence of each individual congregation. I cannot speak too highly of the influence for good exercised by our Provincial Assemblies, nor of the help our District Missionary Associations are to new and struggling congregations, but I would place in the forefront of all the Association of which I have the honour to be President. I had heard much of its work before I became officially connected with it. Now I know from personal observation what that work is, and how well it is done. Its great merit is that it never interferes where it is not wanted, and where it is wanted spares no pains to render all the assistance in its power. Many a struggling church has been lifted from failure to success by its timely advice and support. And it knows when it is beaten, it does not waste its strength on hopeless efforts. We are far too reluctant to admit a failure. By all means let us try and try and try again, but when it is evident that there is no chance of success, let us frankly confess our failure and turn our energies to more hopeful work.

We have quite enough organisation amongst us, what we want is that it should be more heartily and generously supported. I do not think that any Church has better lay help than we have. I speak now from experience when I say that the work of this Association is carried on in a manner beyond all praise. The systematic, kindly and thorough manner in which all the committees work is remarkable. Every case is carefully considered and sifted, and no good cause is refused assistance. I really do not see what any Church requires more for the carrying on of its work.

In conclusion, I would appeal to every one who cares for truth and sincerity in Religion, and where if anywhere, should truth and sincerity be found if not in Religion, to guard with watchful care the freedom of our Church, and to help on to the utmost of their power its beneficent work, determining that not only shall it be a home for ourselves and our children, but a haven of refuge for those who find themselves unable to accept the teachings of other Churches, offering them at all times a ready and sympathetic welcome, causing them to feel that though their search after truth may have compelled them to sacrifice many cherished ideas, and possibly some valued friendships, they have found in our household of faith as warm hearts and deep sympathy as any that they have left behind.

At the conclusion of his address, the President called upon the Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS to give an address on "Dr. Martineau and Unitarian Christianity." Mr. Odgers spoke especially of the growth and development of Dr. Martineau's later views from his earlier opinions as expressed in his Ordination Address at Dublin and in the "Rationale of Religious Enquiry." This address we hope to publish in full next week.

The meeting closed with a hymn, and the Benediction pronounced by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Thursday morning the Conference was held at Essex Hall, Mr. CHARLES W. JONES in the chair.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, of Liverpool, read the following paper:—

POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENTS OF UNITARIAN MISSIONARY WORK IN ENGLAND.

It would be ungracious on my part to question in any way the action of the Committee in asking me to read a paper upon this subject before you, but I confess that I received the invitation with some trepidation. I consoled myself, however, with the reflection that as in the world of politics it seems to be the current practice of statesmen to find out the opinions of "the man in the street" and direct their policy in accordance therewith, so possibly it might be the desire of our leaders to find out the opinion of a "man in the pew," though I feel sure that in their case they will not place any undue value upon it.

What then, in the opinion of a man in a pew, are some of the possible developments of Unitarian Missionary work in England?

May I, before making any attempt to answer, however imperfectly, this question, say just a few words to emphasise what I feel to be the extreme and paramount importance of Unitarian Missionary work.

It would occupy too much time, even if I were able to undertake it, to attempt to specify all we mean by Unitarian Missionary work.

I can at least, however, say what it is not! It is not the inculcation of a creed, or formula of belief. We do not say, "This believe and thou shalt live." We are each of us conscious that we have our own convictions on the subject of the relations between God and Man, but some of us find it hard to formulate them adequately in words; and, however beautiful another man's creed may be, and though we may sympathise with the greater part of it, there is usually some shade of difference which makes us unable to adopt it as the fit expression of our own deepest faith.

Still less does our work consist in the attempt to enforce an anti-creed, a statement of what "Thou shalt not believe." There was a time, possibly, in the history of our churches when there might have been a danger of some such negative position having been more or less generally adopted, but that time, if it ever seriously existed, is past now—for ever past, let us hope. We should find scant enthusiasm in our spiritual nature to answer to the call for such a propaganda to-day.

The distinctive work before our churches seems to be in the direction indicated by Dr. Herford in the excellent booklet just published, as being that feature which particularly differentiated the Presbyterians who became Unitarians from those who remained more or less upon the old doctrinal lines; namely, that they were the most open to new ideas—to new thoughts on the great questions of religion. This, surely, if we have any distinctive work in the Christian world, is ours still, our great privilege and our great responsibility.

The open mind and heart, free to all inspiration from the ever-present Giver of all good from whatever source it may come, the fearless acceptance of that which commends itself to our reverent judgment as true, regardless of the difference it may make to pre-conceived ideas and beliefs, however sacred these may have been to us—this is still the duty which lies nearest to us as Unitarians. It is true that it may call upon us, in the words of the preacher at these Whitsuntide meetings in 1897, to remain always in the van of the Christian army, lacking the comforting support which the presence of a numerous body gives; but come what may, it is surely our work and place, and we can only do our best in that position in the religious world to which it has pleased God to call us. It is certain, however, to my mind, that never in the history of the world, so far as I can understand it, was there a greater need of the missionary zeal which will endeavour to encourage this particular attitude of the human mind than there is to-day. This is a truth which is so obvious to you that it would be presumption on my part to dwell upon it. But for completeness sake, I would wish to say that no possible religious, political, or social reform seems to me so urgent as just the endeavour to persuade every man to ask himself what is the truth on the matters brought under his notice; what is the highest and the best which is revealed to him; and without mental reservation, without consideration of how it will affect his pet Church, or party, or sect, or previously held beliefs, to declare and act up to his conviction of what is true. This is Unitarian Missionary work, whatever else that phrase may include, and the best way of developing this is just the old and familiar one of establishing, in as many centres as possible, the corporate life of a Christian congregation devoted to these ideals.

The words of Dr. Martineau on this subject will occur to you: "The Christian congregation, the most beneficent of human institutions, the best guardian of the sanctities of life, and the asylum of its sweetest affections."

To such a testimony we can only give the glad assent of our own spiritual experience.

May I add that there appears to me to be abroad in men's minds a sad lack of proportion in respect to matters which are truly great, and really important. It is one of the strongest convictions of my soul, one in which I expect you will share with me—that to establish one such centre of religious thought and life, devoted to the reverent search for the truth of God and the service of our fellow-men, is incomparably more important than the clothing of countless millions of the human race with Manchester cotton goods imported free of duty, or the incessant multiplication of rapid communications round the habitable globe.

I have travelled over well-known ground in describing the destination which we should endeavour to reach, and I must needs keep to the beaten path in dealing with the methods adopted to attain these aims. In looking about for fresh centres of missionary activity, which may become in their turn centres of congregational life-effort, the invitation on the part of even a very few kindred spirits is always the most welcome and satisfactory. Failing this, the courses of lectures upon Unitarian Christianity or religious services which will illustrate it are still the recognised means of finding out the needs of any particular locality for our work. Between these two may I emphasise very strongly the advantages of the services, even if they can only be held on an evening during the week, and not on Sunday. I heard one of our ministers once say "that he believed we converted more people by our prayers than by our preaching." But whether that be so or not, the attraction in the case of lectures is apt to be too entirely mental and critical, while the practical illustration of the combination of reverent worship and devotional feeling with the freest expression of mental outlook is often the revelation for which many a soul has been waiting, and such souls are our "good ground."

Nor should we be disheartened if, after a course of services, or several such courses, where we have collected the best we have and cast it upon the water, the result be that only a very few come together to ask for more. We have received what we prayed and wished for, soil in which to sow our seed. Who are we to complain if the garden is a small one?

The possibilities of immortality before an assembly of even twelve people gathered together in an upper room have been shown once in the history of the world at least to be immeasurable, and though such a result is not likely to follow unless some great and unique Son of God once more visits this earth, yet in their humble place and degree a gathering of a similar number in the spirit of the Master may become a veritable supper of the Lord. In the cultivation of such a movement, however small, care should, I think, be taken not to tie the little company of worshippers too early to any fixed responsibilities and habitation in the shape of a building of their own. Better far to nourish, if possible, the infant life of the congregation, in even the most inconvenient of rooms, until they themselves can show sufficient vitality to take a strong step in this direction, and one of the best ways of developing this desired consummation is, I am convinced, the establishment of a Sunday-school. A few earnest teachers can hardly ever fail to find a few children to gather round them on a Sunday, to whom they can become real friends; and through the children is often the shortest road to the hearts of the parents. These won, their minds will soon follow (I may be permitted here to mention a concrete example of what I am urging in the little movement at Garston, which owes so much to the ladies who have worked at the Sunday-school, and which is soon to become the fulcrum of a renewed missionary movement under the able leadership of our friend, H. D. Roberts, of Chester).

Able trained leadership, such as we in Liverpool have been fortunate enough to secure for our missionary work, is not always, however, available. Would that we had more of it! I learn to value more and more, as added experience of these matters brings home to me, the essential needs of a successful movement—the worth of a trained and educated minister, devoting his life to the service of God and his fellow-men. Theoretically, I know, they claim to be only laymen themselves, but we who are laymen know and feel the difference when we come to help to carry on their work. But having said so much gladly, and with a whole heart, may I at the same time urge the importance, in the early stages at least, of such a budding congregation—of an organised body of lay-helpers who may, as opportunity serves, come in to assist and supplement the services of the trained minister when such a one is not available. I know such organisations exist; no District missionary association should be without one.

And while on this branch of the subject may I ask the question why our lay-helpers, who are asked to conduct services and address small assemblies of worshippers, should always be of one sex?

Only preconceived ideas and the habit of use and wont prevent our seeing what a rich fund of spiritual force we fail to use to the best advantage, in shutting out from this work, or refraining from inviting to it, those among the women of our congregations who would be willing to occasionally help in such a way.

I know of no reason against it, while all experience is in its favour. It is their sex who are the natural educators of mankind, it is theirs which is admittedly most richly endowed with true religious and devotional feeling. Why should we, who have been accustomed all our lives to rely upon the inspiration and advice of mother, and sister, and wife, hesitate to welcome the aid which many an earnest woman could give in the conduct and direction of Unitarian missionary services?

I have said nothing so far of the fields still open for such activities. Each district has the best knowledge of its own needs. I can only speak of one.

But it cannot, I think, be considered satisfactory that, in the area which is understood to be under the care in these matters of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, one town of over 70,000 inhabitants and four centres of population varying between 20,000 and 30,000 should not have a Unitarian religious service conducted in their midst from year's end to year's end. In addition to these, upon the border-land between our own and the sister North and East Lancashire Missions, one town of over 50,000 inhabitants has only had a series of services lasting for a few months during, I believe, the last ten years. I speak subject to correction, and refer to Wigan.

And even as regards the two principal cities of our district, there must be nearly one-fourth of the population of Liverpool who would have to travel at least two miles on Sunday to attend a Unitarian religious service, while only one congregation exists in Birkenhead with its 120,000 inhabitants. The proportion of these masses of people who would be desirous of joining or attending the services of any organised body of Unitarian Christians may be small, but I utterly refuse to believe that the opportunities at present afforded them are anything but quite inadequate to the needs of the situation.

I come now to another branch of my subject—the Domestic Missions to the Poor. It may possibly be urged that, as these are undenominational, they cannot be considered, strictly speaking, as Unitarian Missionary work—well, at least they are Missionary work conducted by Unitarians. And I can bear personal testimony to the fact that not the least of the good effects which have followed the work of the missionaries among the more neglected population of our great city has been that widening of the spiritual horizon which has come to many a darkened and depressed soul by the religious services held—as, indeed, are not most of our services held—in places of worship dedicated to no limited doctrinal position, but conducted by ministers who are Unitarians.

I am very far from desiring to enter in this connection into any controversial discussion about names, but I cannot refrain from saying that I think that the two phases of our Missionary work, which we distinguish by the somewhat indefinite titles of District and Domestic, would gain immensely by a recognition of the common ground which each of them have—namely, to quote words used in the charters of two of their respective institutions, "That this Association will aim at the diffusion of a Christianity always open to receive more and more of the inexhaustible light of God, and that this Christianity imposes an obligation on its professors by extending its influence to the most destitute, to equalise, as far as may be, the moral condition of all His children."

In considering this second division of my subject, I think we must be struck with one feature of it, and that is that the movement, based broad as it was upon the highest and most philanthropic motives possible to man, has reached, so far as regards the foundation of fresh centres of usefulness, a sort of arrested development. I do not mean that the already founded institutions, some of which have moved to more suitable and appropriate localities, have had their growth crippled or arrested; but a glance at the "Year Book" will show that since 1863, now nearly forty years ago, only two distinctly new centres of the kind have been started.

Have we, then, ceased to believe in the principles which in 1830 to 1850 led our spiritual forefathers to establish these noble examples of far-sighted benevolence? or can it be true that the need for such institutions has ceased, and there are now no longer any neglected families of the poor who are athirst for spiritual aid, or so far removed from it that they do not even know that they are athirst? To neither of these propositions can we, I think, answer in the affirmative. We still believe in the principles—our religion would be, indeed, a miserable thing if we did not—and there cannot be any question about the continued need!

You know the lives which are being led, in large portions of almost all our great towns, and the conditions under which they are lived. I do not mean to say that they are any worse than the average lives of those who live under happier conditions would be if subjected to the same temptations. I know well that many and many a sweet and loveable character does exist and blossom even among noisome surroundings; that affection and self-sacrifice are as prominent there as in more favoured physical conditions; but this I do say that the lives of hundreds of thousands of our fellow-beings, born and nurtured amid daily sights and sounds of evil and crime, accustomed from their infancy to witness the constant self-indulgence, to experience the criminal neglect of sometimes their own parents, never to have such vicious examples far from them, to spend the day when they grow up in a sordid and monotonous struggle for daily bread, with occasional intervals of heartbreaking and vain searches for work, and their leisure hours in all the associations which are connected with the "public house"—this is a lasting disgrace to any community which suffers it to exist, and must, while it continues, effectually prevent the claim of the nation among whom it is allowed to exist, to the proud title of civilised.

If you say it is the fault of the people themselves, you only change the problem which confronts us. We are our brother's keepers, and our brotherhood often finds us out in civic and national calamity and misfortune, even if we do not acknowledge it.

But if we say, as many of us believe, that the conditions of life, under which so many of our fellows live—the insufficient wage, the high toll for shelter, the constant and alluring temptations, the foul air, the separation from their fellows in more fortunate circumstances—if these are in some measure responsible for the moral and spiritual destitution which undoubtedly exists there, then we have to take into account these conditions in our problem and it becomes a more complex one.

But are we on that account to drop it—to fold our hands and say that this is the work of the politician, or the temperance reformer, or the land nationalised, but not in any specific sense ours?

It may, indeed, be ours if we join in any one of these movements; but is it not ours, too, as a religious organisation striving towards the realisation of Christianity, love to God and to man, in the world around us?

I cannot resist the plain conclusion which is forced upon me, and I venture to claim your assent to it likewise, that it is a labour which it is especially ours to take the lead in, and that the Domestic Missions exist is a testimony to the fact that this has been recognised in the past. For that very distinguishing characteristic which I appealed to at first — the openness of mind to new truth, the faculty of being able to cast off old prejudices when face to face with that which forces itself upon us as a fresh inspiration—is just the attitude of mind which will enable us to find the true solution of these vexed social problems, no less than of the religious ones.

Nor can we be indifferent to the fact that it will make a vast difference in the future well-being of the community if the solution of these problems, as solved they must and will be, is carried out under the softening and refining influence of religious emotions.

If the upward movement in moral and physical condition of those who sorely need it is carried out by the uplifting power of Christian affection, it will be a nobler and sweeter process by far than if won at the fierce cost of political battle, or still more terrible, of revolutionary fury.

And, to my mind, the finest method yet evolved to effect this desirable end is just that personal influence of one soul upon another; the friendly comradeship of those who are wishful to help those not quite so strong or well situated, not the superior person leaning down to raise the inferior, but the side by side companionship of Christian fellowship, which is the essence of the work of our Domestic Missions to the Poor.

This work may well take other forms; but one of the most obvious ways of developing this Missionary work is to multiply the centres of this devoted labour and increase the number of the workers. To do so is to establish congregations dedicated to a free and unfettered Christianity, of which we have previously spoken in districts which sorely need their civilising influence.

In doing so we shall not compete with existing spiritual agencies. Some of the work which in the past has been associated with Domestic Missions is probably already sufficiently well done in most large centres; I refer to the giving of doles by way of temporary help in times of distress.

But this is not what is wanted. In the words of a Church of England clergyman preaching a year or two ago in London, "It is not a question of this or that form of giving relief to the suffering poor that chiefly concerns us, but rather to go to the very root of preventible poverty and misery and strike our blow there."

True that here in London one religious organisation, whose theology and methods are very far removed from those which commend themselves to us, has made a magnificent and self-sacrificing attempt to grapple with these difficulties.

We may not admire in some things the Salvation Army, but we must admit that it has set a noble example to ecclesiastical organisations and religious communities of more august traditions and more cultured exponents. And while we contemplate the contrast, can we not hear sounding somewhere through the ages that dividing and including word, "By their fruits ye shall know them"?

In possible developments of Missionary work along this line, I would include two recent movements, in only a slight degree connected with our churches, but still known and recognised by them—namely, the settlements of students and others in the towns and the labour colonies in the country for those whom it is desirable to remove altogether from their present and immediate surroundings.

And the point which chiefly commends these movements seems to me to be, the close personal relation which they give the opportunity to establish between those who desire to help and those who gladly welcome such assistance; that personal relation which is of the very essence of the work of the Christian disciple and, therefore, Unitarian Missionary work par excellence. You may think that, after all, I have only enunciated palpable truisms, and have not given any practical suggestions. I cannot help it. I did not feel that this was the time and place to go further into details, and have no wish to repeat again what I have said on another occasion. Details will come readily when we determine upon the principles which are to guide us, and are in earnest about carrying them into effect.

There is a saying of someone's, "That if only our power were equal to our will, we should need no other Heaven."

I prefer to reverse the saying, and to declare that, unitedly, we have the power. If only our will were equal to our power, then, indeed, we should not be driven to look to some future and far-off state of existence for the reign of brotherhood, but we should establish it here and now.

The Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, M.A., then read the following paper:—

OPPORTUNITIES AND METHODS OF UNITARIAN WORK SUGGESTED BY EXPERIENCES IN AMERICA.

In undertaking to speak upon the subject assigned me by your Committee, I find myself confronted with two difficulties.

One of these grows out of the distance that separates America from England, and the difference of conditions under which our Unitarian movement finds itself placed in the two countries. To what extent can lessons learned in one country be applied in the other? Can experiences be carried so great a distance without losing at least an important part of their value? These considerations would make me very seriously hesitate about speaking on such a subject, did I not remember that, after all, there is a universal element in experience, as well as a local; and did I not also bear in mind that, as a matter of fact, your experiences on this side have often helped us in our difficulties and problems over there; while some of you are generous enough to say that our experiences on that side have been at times not entirely without service to you here.

The other difficulty that confronts, is that of my own exceedingly limited knowledge of English conditions and events. Granted that there are things on the other side that you would like to know, and experiences which our Unitarian churches there have passed through that might be suggestive to you here, how can one who knows English conditions so imperfectly, judge what they are? A man like Dr. Herford could do it. He knows both countries. If you could have induced him to give you a paper on this subject there would have been no question about its value.

Of course the only path that is open to me is to assume that the cause for which American and English Unitarians are working is fundamentally one, and that the problems to be solved and the obstacles to be overcome on the two sides of the ocean are not radically different. If this be true, as after all I believe it is, then my task becomes clear. It must be simply that of pointing out, as well as I can, in what ways we in America have been most successful in meeting difficulties, in surmounting obstacles, and in strengthening and advancing our general cause.

The history of Unitarianism in America, like yours in England, has been a record of struggle—of hopes and fears, of many discouragements and many encouragements. From the very first we have had largely to grope our way. The task that was given us to do there—as that which was given you here—was an absolutely new thing in the world. There was no precedent for us to follow. No settlers in the wilderness of Canada ever had more truly pioneer work to accomplish than we. What was our task? It was the tremendous, the infinitely difficult, and the infinitely important one of proving whether it were possible to organise religious liberty; whether it were possible really to wed faith and reason; whether it were possible to create a Church in the modern world, which, on the one hand, should hold with absolute fidelity to the deep spiritual religion of Jesus Christ, and keep alive within itself all the sanctities and pieties of the soul, and, on the other hand, should throw open all its windows freely and wide to the light of knowledge and truth.

No wonder that, attempting such a task, we staggered and stumbled sometimes, and tried many an alluring path from which we had later to retrace our steps; and that one and another of our company, at this point and that, grew faint-hearted by the way, and dropped out of our little band, saying, "You are attempting the impossible."

But on the whole the band proved made of hero stuff; and the ideal did not prove a delusion. And to-day, we have there, as you have here, a Church in which religion and liberty, reason and faith, the sanctities of love and worship and the light of the fullest and freest knowledge, are married—married beyond any possibility of divorce.

One of the great problems which from the beginning we have had to face, has of course been that of organisation. Seventy-five years ago we took our first important step in the direction of its solution by organising the American Unitarian Association. That Association, organised the same year and almost the same day with yours, was like yours in most particulars: it was missionary and executive in its aim; it was composed wholly of individual subscribers; and it had no representative connection with our churches. From time to time local associations and conferences were formed in different parts of the country, mainly to promote fellowship and interchange of thought between scattered churches and individuals. In 1865 a National Conference was organised, also for purposes of fellowship and inspiration, and not to raise money or do practical work. Still other local and State Conferences followed, until now nearly every section of the country has its own sectional conference; while, including all, are the two national organisations—the National Conference, a talking body; and the American Unitarian Association, an executive body. All these conferences and associations, local and national, taken together form a system, or organic whole, that is pretty complete and efficient. It is difficult to see how it can be much improved, so far as form or method of organisation is concerned.

One step, however, connected with the working out of this system, was rather slow in being reached; but when once taken it proved, perhaps, the most important in the whole series. It was that of making our National Unitarian Association a representative body, and thus giving it a direct connection with all our churches. So long as it remained a body composed of simply individual subscribers, we were never able to make it in the fullest sense national. We were never able to secure for it that full and complete confidence of our churches that was desirable. There were always persons who said, "It is a Boston affair"; or, "It is run by a set." We were never able to secure quite that hearty confidence and co-operation between the National Conference and the Association, that was important. Still further, while the Association was controlled by officers whom the churches had no voice in choosing, its money support was not adequate. At last it came to be seen that in order to make it the effective missionary arm of the denomination that was needed, it must be brought closer to the churches. Something must be done to make the churches—all the churches—feel that it was theirs. The way to do this, of course, was so to change the nature of the Association as to give the churches a representative voice in its management. This change was made. Its membership now consists partly of individual subscribers, as before, and partly of representatives appointed by contributing churches. The result has been all that could be asked. The old jealousies that existed towards the Association have passed away. Now it has the confidence of practically everybody; and our whole constituency of churches stands almost solidly behind it.

I call attention to this because of the great importance of the results that have come from it. It gave us almost at once such a unity of practical action among our churches as we had never before known. It nearly doubled the amount contributed annually by our churches for missionary and church extension work; and it probably more than doubled the general missionary efficiency of our body.

Another event in our recent history is equally worthy of attention. I refer to the action of our National Unitarian Conference, six years ago, in placing itself upon the clear and simple basis of the religion of Jesus. That action was as influential in promoting spiritual unity and harmony among us, as was the action of the Association, which I have referred to, in promoting organic unity and harmony.

We have not always in the past had harmony in thought or in spiritual aims, any more than in organisation and practical aims. We have had to feel our way to unity in ideals, as well as to unity in work. We have had our "Conservatives" and our "Radicals," and these have not always loved each other any too well, or extended to each other any too brotherly a fellowship. We have had our "left wing" and our "right wing," and these have been sometimes pretty far apart, and not very harmonious.

We have had no little discussion and division over names. There have been some among us, who, while holding to the central teaching of Jesus—of the Divine Fatherhood and the Human Brotherhood—have had serious doubts whether we ought to keep the name "Christian." "As the world understands that name," they have urged, "it certainly has a dogmatic signification. For fifteen hundred years and more it has been associated, inseparably associated, with dogmas which we as believers in rational religion reject. Therefore, if we would be honest, must we not lay the name aside as spoiled, as misleading, and take some other, like 'Free Religious,' or 'Independent,' or 'Unitarian' without the 'Christian,' which is really broad and undogmatic." On the other hand, we have had some among us who have objected to the Unitarian name for much the same reasons. They have thought that name dogmatic, and wanted it laid aside and the Christian name kept.

We have had no little agitation and worry over questions of "sectarianism," and of "breadth" or "narrowness." There have been some among us who have carried all their lives a sort of chronic fear lest something might be done, somewhere, that somebody might suspect of being sectarian.

Well, it seems almost too good to be true, but it is true: this kind of thing has nearly all passed away. To-day we hear hardly an echo of it anywhere, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. What is the cause of the change? Principally the action referred to, taken by our National Conference. Our old trouble over "Radical" and "Conservative," I think I am justified in saying, is entirely gone. Conservatives and Radicals have found that below their differences there is a deeper common faith. It is the old experience over again, that as men go down to the deeper things they tend to come together. Our old trouble about "wings," too, has gone. Robert Collyer says: "The Unitarian bird in America has no wings any more—it is all body. Or, if it does have wings, at least they are no longer used for beating and striking one another, but only for united effort, to fly with." Our trouble about names has gone with the rest. With the names "Unitarian" and "Christian" defined as meaning the faith of Jesus, as we believe our National Conference was right in defining them, there are no names that we all more gladly accept, as there are none that seem to us intrinsically greater or nobler.

Our fear of sectarianism is disappearing because we are more and more coming to the consciousness that we are not a sect; we are a Church—a Church of ethical and spiritual religion, without a single dogmatic or sectarian feature. A sect is a body that is sectional. The Unitarian Church in America is not sectional. Whatever it may have been in the past, its basis to-day is the universal. A sect is a body which cuts itself off by some peculiar dogma or practice from others. We cut ourselves off from none. So far as I know—and I have taken large pains to inform myself upon this subject—there is not in all America one single conference, association, or church, that is founded upon any dogmatic or sectarian creed or statement or sentence. With differing forms of expression, our associational organisations and our churches are all founded upon what is common to every form of Christianity in the world. In other words they are all based upon what is central in all ethical and spiritual religion.

I would not be understood as claiming that this great and happy change which has come to us since the memorable action of our National Conference at Saratoga in 1894, is wholly the result of that action. Rather it is the result of all our thought, and all our groping, and all our struggles and prayers for seventy-five years, and more. But the crowning deed by which all that had gone before was unified and completed, was the action taken six years ago at Saratoga; where, after a long and full discussion—indeed, as the culmination of a discussion which had been going on among us everywhere earnestly for ten years—the whole body of representatives of our churches in National Conference assembled by a unanimous vote—not one single voice dissenting—planted our chief national organisation on the simple basis of the two eternal commands of Jesus. Here are the historic words:—"These churches (the Unitarian churches of America) accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man."

It is worth while in this place to call attention to the fact that by this Saratoga action, and what went before it, we have created for ourselves in America, essentially what your great and honoured Dr. Martineau laboured so long and earnestly to create in England—namely, a great Free Church movement, a great "open trust" religious body, a great undogmatic, non-sectarian, spiritual, Christian Church, with its doors wide open to every sincere worshipper of God and lover of man.

Dr. Martineau, at your Leeds Conference, uttered his famous saying, "If any one, being a Unitarian, shrinks on fitting occasion from plainly calling himself so, he is a sneak and a coward. If, being of our Catholic communion, he calls his chapel or its congregation Unitarian, he is a traitor to his spiritual ancestry, and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors."

Many of us in America, while regarding Dr. Martineau with the profoundest love and reverence, nevertheless believe that in that last sentence he reveals the great practical mistake of his life. We have created on the other side of the sea such a Church as he longed for; but we could not follow him in the name we gave it. Instead, we found ourselves all united in lifting above it as the truest banner-word we knew, that name which to us seems the largest, the richest in spiritual significance, the most catholic, the most intrinsically unsectarian, in the world; that name which in its very meaning gathers up into one all the deepest unities of God, of man, of the spiritual universe; the name that our fathers loved, the name that Channing and Parker and Martineau claimed as their own, the name that has cost more of sacrifice, of faith, of moral heroism than any other of modern times, the name which for a century has been the world's best known symbol of religious freedom—the name Unitarian.

This is as much as time permits me to say regarding our two leading national organisations—the American Unitarian Association and the National Conference. Let me turn now to some organisations of a different and somewhat more limited character. I have particularly in mind three, which have proved of much service, and which I believe you do not have anything quite like here. One is an organisation of our young people, known as the Young People's Religious Union; the second is an organisation of our women, called the Women's Alliance; the third is a group of clubs, formed by our men, and generally known as Unitarian Clubs. Let me speak of each of these in turn.

First, the Young People's Religious Union. Of this you already know something through Mr. Ellis' paper at the Leicester Conference. But I may speak of it briefly. We have long had among the young people of our American churches a great deal of literary and social life. For years many of our churches have had Unity Clubs, and other literary and social organisations for their young people, many of which have been very successful, and accomplished important results. But few of these societies did much that was distinctly religious. More and more it came to be felt among us that here was a lack. Literary culture and social enjoyment are good; but they do not take the place of religion. So the question began to be considered in many quarters, What can be done to meet the religious needs of our young people? As a result, here and there a society was formed with distinctly religious aims; and at last a general movement in that direction was made, by organising, five years ago, what is known as our National Young People's Religious Union. Its aim is to form in every church an association of the young people, on a basis as religious as that of the Church itself, to take the young people by the hand as they begin to think about leaving the Sunday-school, to show them that religion is for them, to interest them in its development in their own lives, to put them in religious training for the church, and to lead them into the church to become active worshippers and workers there. The number of churches that have organised these Young People's Unions, up to this time, is some 120 or 130, and is steadily increasing. I noticed that the number of new Unions reported as formed last month was five. This movement is distinctly quickening the religious life of our churches. It is saving many young people to us who without it would drift away and be lost. It is training up a body of young workers for our churches.

A valuable feature of the movement, too, is its missionary aim. Our Unions have it for one of their objects to do something for somebody else, and to spread our Gospel. Already they have combined to support a College Town Mission—that at Amherst, in Massachusetts. The Universalist churches in America, which you know are similar to the Unitarian, have also their Young People's Unions, similar to ours. And their Unions are doing a most vigorous missionary work. Already they have established two new churches—raising the money to buy the lots to build the church edifices, and to sustain the preachers until the societies were on their feet. There is hope for any Church when its young people get the missionary spirit.

I am glad to add my word to that of Mr. Ellis, in calling attention to this Young People's Religious Union Movement, because I believe it has in it large possibilities of good for our cause. Certainly its results in America have been valuable. I cannot see why they should not be equally so here.

I come now to the organisation which has been formed among our American women. This organisation, known as our Women's Alliance, has a local branch in nearly every church. Its object is to associate the women of our churches together for the strengthening of local causes, for the advancement of the general cause, and for doing good in such ways as may open.

It is remarkable what enterprise, what zeal, and how many useful activities the Alliance has developed. It is remarkable how much money it has raised. I do not have its last report. But according to the latest that is within my reach, it raises and disperses annually, through its general organisation, that is, aside from the work of its local branches, from twelve to fifteen hundred pounds a year. This is for general missionary or church extension work in some form. But if we include the money raised by the local branches and expended in various ways at home, the sum swells to between six and seven thousand pounds a year. Let me mention some of the things the Alliance does. It carries on a very large amount of post-office mission work, from many centres—a work practically covering the whole of America. Long ago the list of names of persons to whom it was regularly sending Unitarian literature, and with whom it was corresponding, filled eleven stout ledgers. It raises money for the publication of important tracts and pamphlets. It conducts a "Cheerful Letter Exchange" whereby large numbers of letters of cheer and helpfulness are sent from ladies to invalids and persons shut in from the world; and it publishes a special monthly periodical for the benefit of such invalids and "shut-ins." It sends out books singly, and in the form of small libraries, to readers in remote country places.

It establishes and helps carry on circles for Sunday religious worship in places where we have no churches—these circles sometimes developing into churches. It establishes and helps maintain mission Sunday-schools, religious study classes, mothers' meetings, kindergartens for poor children. Through its various branches it does a very large amount of benevolent and charitable work of many kinds for the poor, the unfortunate, the suffering.

It was the Women's Alliance that helped Mr. Singh's Unitarian Mission in India to make its start—to print its hymn-book and its first tracts, and to open its first church and school. At different times and in various ways it has rendered aid to our important mission in Japan. It helps pay the expenses of young men without means who are studying for the ministry. It has aided in carrying on educational and religious work among the negroes in the South, and among the aboriginal Indian tribes in the Far West. At the present time it is helping several new societies to build churches, one of these being the young society at Ottawa, the capital of Canada. It is aiding several struggling churches to pay off their debts, so that thus they may get upon their feet and be able to go alone. It is helping to support two missionaries in our Southern States, where in the past our cause has not obtained much footing.

Thus is it doing good in numberless ways which are not denominational, while at the same time it is a great power in developing the life of our individual churches, in lending aid and encouragement to new and struggling societies, in scattering our thought far and wide by the printed page, and in kindling and keeping burning in our whole body the missionary spirit.

It should be borne in mind that what is accomplished by it, is in addition to all that regular work in our churches which men and women naturally do together. The Alliance is not a rival to anything else in the church. It does not set up the women of a church against the men, as some have foolishly imagined. It does not draw away from other parts of the church's life. It simply calls into activity a valuable new agency—a valuable new source of moral and spiritual power, which but for the Alliance would for the most part remain latent and unemployed.

Nor does the organisation of our women for work on their own lines, draw away from the larger, general work of the American Unitarian Association. Rather it helps that. The women's organisation kindles a zeal which spreads to other agencies. As a rule, where the Alliance is most active the Unitarian Association gets warmest and strongest support. The past year the Association has raised and expended for missionary and church extension work, $75,000, or £15,000. The work done by the Women's Alliance is in addition and supplemental to this. By far the most valuable auxiliary the Association has, is the Women's Alliance.

As I state these facts regarding this organisation of our Unitarian women in America, it is not unnatural for me to ask myself the question whether a similar organisation might not be of service to you in England. Of course that question nobody can answer but you.

This brings me to our organisations in America, known as Unitarian Clubs. I wonder how many of you have had your attention called to these clubs. They are something comparatively new; but I think they are quite worth knowing about. In the places where they exist they are proving distinct sources of strength to our cause. They are mainly confined to our larger cities, as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Chicago, San Francisco. And yet some relatively small places have organised them, and with success. In one locality in Central Massachusetts, six or eight churches, some of them in villages, have united to form a very excellent Unitarian Club. The clubs are composed exclusively of men; though at least once a year they have a "Ladies' Night," on which ladies are invited. A few clubs meet one evening a month; but the larger number not oftener than once in two months; and some only three or four times a year. The plan carried out is this:—Each meeting begins with a dinner, somewhat elaborately served, at six or half-past six o'clock. This lasts an hour or an hour and a quarter, to give plenty of time for chat. At most of the clubs, if anybody wants to light a cigar at the close of the dinner, he is at liberty to do so; except, of course, on ladies' night. When the dinner is well over, without withdrawing from the tables, the president calls the club to order and introduces the speakers of the evening. And here comes the feature that gives the clubs their power. The ablest speakers that can be found are provided, and the subjects discussed are of the most living character. Perhaps at a majority of the meetings the speakers are Unitarians, but at many they are not; the practice is to go freely to every religious denomination, and outside of all denominations, and lay hand on men, wherever they may be found, who are able to give the weightiest thought upon the subjects to be discussed.

Some of the subjects considered are of special interest to us as Unitarians. Then, naturally, we have mainly Unitarian speakers. But our range of themes is not confined to Unitarianism, or even technically to religion. We open our doors to great questions of social reform, to great political questions whose significance is mainly moral, to all questions which vitally affect the general social, moral or religious welfare. And it is interesting to note that when we discuss these great themes of general concern there is no talent that we are not able to avail ourselves of, from editors of our most influential papers, and presidents of our universities, and members of Congress, and judges of our highest courts, to organisers of industry, and leaders of our federations of labour.

These Unitarian clubs have value in several different ways. For one thing, they mightily interest our men—our best men, our strongest men—lawyers, doctors, educators, literary men, public men, business men, all men who have brains. There is too much of a tendency for men, especially men of influence, who get absorbed in other things, to slip out of our churches. These clubs are a hand, and a hand with a good deal of grip in it, to keep hold of them.

Another good effect of these clubs is their broadening influence in the community. Ours is the one Christian body which is in a position to open its doors and invite honest religious thinkers of all names to meet on a plain of equality for the candid discussion of religious subjects. As we do this, year after year, in our clubs, the result is marked in dispelling prejudice, in breaking down sectarian walls, and in creating a spirit of greater religious breadth and charity all around us.

Still another important end these clubs serve. They enable us to make our religion felt in connection with great questions of public concern, without splitting up our churches and embittering the feelings of our people. There is nothing more important than to carry the principles of our religion into politics. It is vital to the public well-being that great national and social questions shall be tried by such standards of moral judgment as are set up in our churches. How can this be done? To some extent we can take these questions into our pulpits. But this must be done with care, or else we shall accomplish more harm than good, because many of these questions have two sides—yes, many sides; and what is wanted is not your dogmatic utterance or mine on this side or on that. What is wanted is light—light on all sides, which shall enable us all to see more clearly the thing that is just and right.

Now, here it is that these clubs come in to help us—to help us in exactly the way we need. They furnish a place to discuss these subjects; to express our full thought; to listen to the strongest men there are on both sides, and all sides; to bring every question to the moral test. By this means we are able to make our religion bear mightily on politics; and without in any way turning our pulpits into political platforms.

I give you this brief description of the American Unitarian Clubs, because they are an agency by means of which the American churches in many places are seeking to achieve, and are achieving, certain important ends which there does not seem to be any other means of attaining so effectively. I have often thought, what a power such a club might be made in London! Is there not a place for such a club here—a place not now filled by any agency? And are there not places for such clubs in twenty other English cities? I venture to ask these questions.

I shall call your attention to only one more matter. That shall be the effort which is being made in many quarters in America, not only in our own churches but in others, to make a little broader religious appeal to the people, or to bring religion to bear upon the public thought and life from more sides and in somewhat more practical ways, than have been common in the past. There is a growing feeling that there is danger of limiting the usefulness of our churches by treading too blindly in the ways of our fathers, and by thinking too exclusively about what preachers and churches were accustomed to do in the past; instead of asking what we need to do now in this distinctly new time, when life is so different, and when religious conditions are so new. I think our best experience in America justifies the belief that there are no better fields for missionary work than right around our own churches; that as preachers and churches we should seek the people; that we should put ourselves into the closest possible relation with the people's thought and life; that we should adapt our efforts as far as practicable to their demands and needs, and not insist too strenuously that they shall come to our fixed ways. In other words, I think it is the growing judgment of our most earnest and successful men that it is our duty to keep our eyes open for opportunities to go outside of the regular church routine, and do such missionary work as, for example, hold Sunday afternoon popular services in parks and open places, as our Boston ministers have been doing every summer for years on Boston Common; organise and carry on in our churches such popular services as your English "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon" meetings; take public halls and theatres sometimes, and carry on series of strong, earnest, high-class popular services there, not hesitating to make large use of music, orchestral and other; from time to time hold series of vesper services on Sunday afternoons or evenings, not with your own people, but with the outside public, in view, also in those making large use of music; vary the regular routine of the Sunday evening by courses of earnest practical sermons and addresses to young people, to young men, to working people; make a free use of the lantern on Sunday evenings, not for sensational effects, not as a cheap show, but as a wholly legitimate appeal to the eye—for instruction and for impression—to enable you to drive home truth to men's hearts through two senses instead of one—through eye as well as ear—thus in the presenting of many a theme fully doubling your power to stamp your thought on men's minds and consciences.

Even further still I would go, and I think our best experience in America justifies this. Making my morning services always as devout as possible, as tender, as comforting, as uplifting, as deeply helpful to the spiritual life of all my people as possible, I would then feel at liberty, when evening came—and not only at liberty, but in duty bound, as a public teacher, to bring into my pulpit as occasion might demand, great subjects of public concern that are occupying the attention of the community and the nation, and that need to be settled on the high principles of justice and religion; either speaking on them myself and giving to the people what help I could, or, doing better still, bringing before my congregation, from time to time, other men—men of light and leading, men who care for the public weal, men of character and knowledge, who have devoted special study to these great subjects, and to the moral principles that underlie them, and therefore who are masters, capable of giving to us all, as men, as citizens, and as Christians, the knowledge and the moral help we need.

Such are some of the ways in which many ministers in America—not only Unitarians, but a larger number still of the broader-minded and more earnest ministers of the Evangelical bodies—are learning to do a most important kind of missionary work in their communities—by broadening their appeal, by availing themselves of methods that are more living, by going out to the people and trying to minister to the practical and many-sided needs of the great public around them, as well as to the spiritual wants of their own church members.

Friends, we are gathered here, on this seventy-fifth anniversary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to take counsel together as to what can be done to advance the cause for which this Association exists—a cause dear to us all. I have been talking to you about certain forms of organisation, plans of work, and missionary methods, which have been found useful and effective by our brethren on the other side of the sea—with the hope that experience over there might not be wholly without interest and suggestive value to us here. But let us not forget that, after all, there is something deeper and more important than any of these merely external things. The best outward agencies, and the most perfect denominational and church and missionary machinery, of themselves alone, are dead; they can be made alive only by the living spirit of missionary zeal and consecration.

Can we, any of us, for a moment doubt that the future of the Unitarian Church, alike in England and in America, is indissolubly bound up with the question of whether or not it is to be a missionary Church?

It seems to me that every sign in the spiritual world indicates with a clearness that we cannot mistake, that the simple, central religion of Jesus Christ, which is love—love to God above us, and to humanity by our side—the religion which in so peculiar a sense has been committed to us as Unitarians—is to be the religion of the future. But it also seems to me that all the signs of the present and all the teaching of the past quite as clearly show that the indispensable condition of its becoming the religion of the future is, that it shall first be set on fire in the hearts of mighty believers; in other words, that a body of men and women and churches must appear, who so deeply feel its beauty, its preciousness and its power, and who are filled with so noble a spirit of unselfishness and zeal for doing good, that they cannot rest until with glowing hearts they carry its teachings of light and hope and life to others near and far.

Is the Unitarian Church to-day such a body? If it is, let us thank God and go forward. If it is not, then the question of questions for us all is, how, with God's help, we may make it such.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE in opening the discussion congratulated the readers of the papers upon the many suggestions they had put before the Conference. There were matters which required the most delicate handling. He imagined that a great deal of good work might be done by the lady members of the churches, and felt that something on the lines of the Women's Alliance might be started. With regard to Unitarian Clubs, Liverpool had already adopted something on these lines. He trusted that the work of Domestic Missions, referred to by Mr. Robinson, would be readily and better supported. They must be satisfied with the day of small things, and work on until the day of greater things came.

The Rev. MARION MURDOCK said she had been extremely interested in Mr. Sunderland's comprehensive and satisfactory paper giving an account of the work in America, and of the happy feeling which now existed in the different branches of the work throughout the country. Nothing was, perhaps, more gratifying than the growing up of the Young People's meetings. The experience was that the Young People's meetings must not be elder people's meetings in the guise of young people's meetings. Some difficulty had been experienced, but it was found better to allow the young people to conduct their own meetings. She remembered attending one of the so-called "Young People's meetings" before such organisation was made possible. The young people were sitting down and listening while the talking was being done by elders. Mr. Sunderland had also spoken of the Women's Alliance, which had become such an effective organisation. Last year the sum of money raised by various local branches of the Alliance amounted to some 45,000 dollars. All this money was applied for the building up of Unitarian churches and helping smaller churches. When any smaller church needed help the general body of the Alliance would send out slips asking for assistance—perhaps a dollar or two. The response would be, perhaps, four or five hundred dollars for the church which was to be assisted. Such help was of a substantial kind, but was really no burden to the other churches. Of the women in America who had and were doing effective work no one had done more scholarly and devoted work than the gifted wife of Mr. Sunderland. In conclusion, the speaker said that if at any time people in England might feel discouragement at their work in consequence of the obstacles which were placed before them, it would be well always to remember that the English race across the water was reaping rich fruits of the courage of their ancestors in liberal thought in this country. It was through the steadfastness and wonderful courage of Priestley and Lindsey among others that such an enthusiastic body, pledged to the cause of Liberal Religion, had grown up in America. They were never forgetful that a great deal was owing to the English race, which had bequeathed a spirit of liberty to them.

The Rev. C. J. STREET, who followed, said he wished to slightly correct Mr. Robinson in his paper. That gentleman had seemed rather pessimistic in thinking that only two domestic missions had been started in recent years. There had been more than two; one in particular at Croydon was established in 1886. There were others to his knowledge. Personally he thought it was a great mistake that Unitarians had divided their work up in so many ways. The work would be done in a much better manner if there was amalgamation. There was a practical suggestion which he wished to make from his experience in the North, and he hoped that every association would encourage it more or less. The North and East Lancashire Mission had a number of assisted congregations which would have to be assisted for many years to come. It had not been possible for some of the congregations to become independent and to pay their own way out of their own resources; and the question which had had to be faced was how they were to be assisted, because the funds of the Union were being spent, and they had to economise. The solution was that the missionary congregations should be encouraged to establish independence funds for themselves, and that the Missionary Associations should help them by granting 20 per cent. on every £100 raised. This was working very well. It was necessary that there should be a small endowment to work upon, and therefore there was a fund now being invested by those congregations with the approval of the Missionary Association. The result was that before long the grant was proportionally reduced; the congregations were helped towards independence; and the Missionary Society was able to turn its attention elsewhere, and able to do more work.

Mr. Cosens Prior spoke of his impressions of the work of the Young People's movement. It had been tried at his church, and had been found very serviceable in gathering the young people together. He recommended the movement to other congregations.

The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth entered a word of personal protest against the spirit of some of the utterances of the speakers. They had been told that they should be satisfied with the day of small things. It was time that they should throw off that idea; and it was time that they should have a little more genuine faith and genuine passion. It was always being said that Unitarians were the leaders of opinion of modern times. He did not believe that was true to the extent it was affirmed. It rather seemed to him that the great tide of society was swinging along and leaving them behind, petrified into obelisks to mark the course of religious progress in the past. He urged that the utterances of Unitarian ministers should be of things that men were looking for, and the things which would lead them to God.

Mr. Grosvenor Lee expressed surprise that Mr. Charlesworth should be anxious to attack Mr. Agate for endeavouring to comfort in a day of small things. He would like to ask Mr. Charlesworth when he was going to give some facts about the work in his own district. He was surprised to find the other day that there was no report from any of the aided churches in the Midlands. Speaking of Mr. Sunderland's allusions to the benefits which had accrued to the American Unitarian Association through developing their organisation and allowing it to become representative of the churches, when he (the speaker) proposed some years ago that the rules of the Association might be altered so that each District Association should send a member to the committee of the Central Association, the resolution was not carried, on the very practical ground that, even if members of churches were appointed in different parts of the kingdom, it would be almost impossible to get delegates to come up to different meetings in London. What he would like to know was, how delegates came from distant places to the meetings of the American Association? Another question arose immediately one came to representation, and the National Conference would probably find that out itself. Was the minority to be bound by the majority? If there was an organisation such as was described by Mr. Sunderland, to which churches would send representatives, and if delegates were forced to express opinions by which they would be bound, he would tell them for certain that it was sure to break down. Whatever else they differed upon, all would heartily agree that each congregation was to manage itself.

The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth protested against the insinuations of Mr. Lee. The Midland Union had good reason for keeping back the reports of the aided churches.

Mr. J. Cogan Conway, after having pointed out that there were ladies at work in various churches in the South of England, and having testified to their capabilities, asked of Mr. Sunderland if the American Association had adopted the policy which the British and Foreign Association had adopted of regularly diminishing grants.

The Rev. Dr. Zillman (Sydney) also spoke, arguing that as Australia had sent aid to South Africa, English Unitarians should not forget to send out to them suitable young men for the ministry.

The Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford said that if more of their friends had begun life as he had amongst the small things they would have been very glad to have come to a time when they could venture to talk a little large. He was thankful for Mr. Street's sermon of the previous day. He remembered forty-nine or fifty years ago when they all were criticising themselves except those who criticised each other, he always said that the day of large things would come. In many ways it had come, and he was thankful for it; but he believed still in the little efforts and in careful ways. He did not care twopence about the future. He did not know whether the Lord was going to build a great Church in the name of the Unitarians or not, but he was certain that it would be somewhere about the principles that they had been standing up for which some called by one name and some by another. He confessed that he had never found a better name than the old name which was good enough for Channing, and whether they called their churches by it or not it did not matter to him. The time would come when they would all feel that that name and the thing it stood for were somewhere as near as they had been able to get to the religion of Jesus Christ and the eternal truths of God. Meanwhile, let there be criticism, for they would not know themselves without it. Yet matters went steadily on and the general tone of the meetings had been confidence in good work, always seeing, as Mr. Sunderland had said, that it was the principle at the bottom that mattered most. They might not be able to count their progress or see the hour-hand moving, but it was moving, and as he looked back over the last fifty years he saw that it moved steadily and faster all the time. He prayed to God that it might so go on.

The Rev. J. C. Street said he had been connected with the missionary side of the churches more permanently than almost any man among them. The papers had both been extremely profitable and valuable, and the suggestions contained in Mr. Robinson's paper would not be overlooked or forgotten by those concerned in English work. One or two of the suggestions in Mr. Sunderland's paper were sure to command respectful attention of many of the churches in England. But there were points which did not command his sympathy. He was not at all sorry for the utterances of Mr. Charlesworth because in his opinion there was a need of greater inspirationalism. There never was a time such as the present when the demand for progressive thinkers had been greater. England was ripe unto the harvest; God only knew where the reapers were to come from; but if the labourers were ready the work was upon their hands.

The President then congratulated the readers of the papers, and

Mr. Robinson, in replying, said he was glad of Mr. Street's correction in the matter of Domestic Missions.

The Rev. J. T. Sunderland thanked the meeting for their attention. There was no attempt on the part of the American Association to legislate for the churches. The representatives were sent to do general work, and not to make rules for the churches. The Association did believe in regularly diminishing grants. He concluded with some earnest words as to the need for more self-forgetfulness on the part of ministers and churches, as devoted not to their own interests, but to the great cause of religion and human life.

The Conference then terminated.

In the evening the meetings were concluded by a conversazione at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, when the President received the members of the Association and a large number of other friends.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

The Study of Comparative Religion.

IV.

The Sacred Books of the East (ii.).

In the year 1578 a young Italian Jesuit named Matthew Ricci arrived at Goa to complete his course of theology in preparation for missionary work in the East. Francis Xavier had already carried the cross to Japan, and in the year of Ricci's birth laid down his life upon the China shore. What Xavier had died for, Ricci accomplished. It was the beginning of the labours which were to be so eventful for the Church, and to reveal some of the strange features of the Flowery Land. Ricci taught chemistry and mathematics as well as the Gospel; and he acquired such mastery of Chinese that his treatise in that language on "The True Doctrine of God" had the honour of a place in a famous collection of the best Chinese works in 160,000 volumes! The studies which he prosecuted so successfully were maintained by his successors. While the English Church was engaged in driving out the Presbyterians in 1662, Father Da Costa was printing at Kian-chang-foo the first text and translation of the Confucian treatise entitled "The Great Learning." A quarter-of-a-century later, in 1687, the three treatises, "The Great Learning," "The Doctrine of the Mean," and "The Discourses and Conversations," were published at Paris in Latin, under the title "Confucius Sinarum philosophus,* sive Scientia Sinensis Latine exposita."

The characteristic teaching of the "Middle Empire" thus found its way to Europe long before the treasures of Indian thought had been unsealed. The eighteenth century saw further effort in the same direction. In 1711 Father Noel produced at Prague a collection of extracts entitled "Philosophia Sinica," containing passages from the most celebrated philosophers on three great topics, (1) the Supreme Being, (2) the Doctrine of the Spirit, and the ceremonies in honour of the dead, (3) human duty, from the point of view of the individual on the one hand, and the family and society on the other. Father Prémare compiled a Chinese-Latin dictionary; and Father Gaubil translated the first and most important of the Five Classics, the "Shu

King, or Book of Historical Documents."* Other scholars toiled at description and history, so that an ample foundation was laid for the brilliant labours in the present century of Rémusat and Stanislas Julien at home, or of the British missionaries Morrison and Medhurst, Legge, Beal, and Edkins—to mention no other students—on the spot.

The name of Confucius (550–478 B.C.) is associated rather with ethics than with religion. He does not profess to be an innovator or reformer. He is supposed to have collected and edited the ancient records of the "Shu" and the Odes of the "Shi." The imperial religion still at this day reposes on its antique basis, the sublime order of the living Heaven and Earth, mythologically conceived as bound together in wedded union. Of this order the conscience of man, according to Confucius, was the reflex: every faculty had its normal use: in the recognition and fulfilment of this use lay the field of duty, whether personal or social. But he knew well the difficulties in the way. When he was asked by a disciple "Is there one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life?" he gave the famous answer "Is not reciprocity such a word? What you do not want done to yourself, do not to others." It has often been observed that this is only a negative form of the Golden Rule. But its positive application was in his mind, though his own consciousness of failure prevented him from enjoining it on others, for he went on to add with sorrowful humility, "There are four things to not one of which have I as yet attained. To serve my father as I would require my son to serve me, I am not yet able. To serve my ruler as I would require my minister to serve me, I am not yet able. To serve my elder brother as I would require a younger brother to serve me, I am not yet able. To set the example of behaving to a friend as I would require him to behave to me, I am not yet able."

It was among the great services of the learned and genial Dr. Legge that in his splendid edition of the Chinese classics, he sketched some of the later phases of ethical philosophy among the successors of the Sage. On the one hand was the principle of Yang Chu, known as "each for himself": on the other that of Mih Teih, "loving all equally." Why did thieves steal, and states make war? It was for want of mutual love. Were this practised, the strong would no longer prey upon the weak, the rich would not do despite to the poor, the deceitful would cease to impose upon the stupid. But Mencius (or Mang-tse, born in 371 B.C.) restored the Confucian doctrine in a manner somewhat more closely resembling Butler's conception of human nature; and ever since Confucius has held sway over Chinese thought, according to the well-known prophecy, in the proud character of a "throneless king." His reserve, however, concerning the higher conceptions of religion did not prevent the development of the venerable doctrine of the Personal Heaven into a real Theism. The singular controversy which broke out among the Protestant missionaries more than fifty years ago (in which Dr. Bowring took a prominent part along with Medhurst, Legge, and others), as to the most suitable Chinese equivalent for "God," brought a large quantity of evidence to light, proving the wide-spread theistic interpretation of the ancient texts. Not unfairly did the author of the first article in the "Mémoires concernant les Chinois" describe their religion as "une Déisme avec quelques superstitions."

The scholarship of the past century has done much to elucidate the Confucian doctrine, but it has done more to unveil the history and significance of the other two religions of China—Taoism and Buddhism. France led the way in Europe, but Great Britain on the spot. The Jesuit missionaries had already made acquaintance with the enigmatic little book entitled the "Tao-te-king: the Book of the Way and of Virtue," ascribed to Lao Tse, the elder contemporary of Confucius. They delighted in finding anticipations of Catholic truth, and Father Amiot believed himself able to recognise in Lao Tse's teaching the three persons of the Trinity. To this book M. Rémusat devoted a famous memoir, in which he sought to prove that in the sixth century B.C. ideas were passing to and fro, so that the sacred name of Israel's God IHWH travelled across the continent, and was enshrined in the philosophy of the Far East. His pupil and successor in the Collège de France, M. Stanislas Julien, published the text with a translation in 1842, but the allusions to the Trinity and to the four holy letters were set quietly aside. Instead, there appeared a collection of aphorisms, grouped around one central term, the Tao, the "way" or "path." Others have translated it since (Legge's version will be found in the "Sacred Books of the East," xxxix.), and some, like Mr. H. A. Giles, have expressed doubts of its authenticity; but there seems no reason to question that it substantially represents the philosopher's speculations, whether or not it issued in its present form from his own hands. The Tao has various aspects. Outwardly, it is the ordered "way" which Nature treads upon her daily course. It is the sum of all the elements of the world's harmony, represented especially by the steady path of the heavenly bodies, the succession of the seasons, the permanence and regularity of the annual round. But whence does all this issue? Behind the visible Tao lies the Tao unnamed, unseen, unheard, the mysterious source whence all phenomena proceed. In this ancient presentation of the Absolute lies the ground of all things; and to know it and live according to it is the wise man's aim. For it is ever silently working, a ceaseless energy pervading all nature, where everything fulfils its own law. Unhasting, unresting, uniform and constant, seeking nothing for itself, it produces, nourishes, supports, matures, completes, but it makes no claims and never vaunts itself. If all things, however, have a law of their being which it is their destiny to fulfil, what about man? He, too, is the organ of the Tao. Man takes his law from the earth, the earth takes its law from heaven, heaven takes its law from the Tao, and the law of the Tao is its being what it is. So Lao Tse reaches by a kind of philosophical intuition after the ultimate unity, revealed in heaven, earth, and man. Heaven and earth are the two great symbols which sum up the energies of the universe; they act without acting, for they do not interfere; they give each object, whether sun or star, stream, tree, or bird, opportunity to fulfil the inner purpose of its being. This is their impartiality, and man's conduct should be like it, he should have no personal ends. Looking at the grand order, then, Lao Tse drew the same lesson which Jesus drew from the equal bounty of the sun and rain. "Recompense injury with kindness," he said. It was too hard doctrine for Confucius. "What, then," he asked, "will you return for good? Recompense injury with justice, and return good for good." That was not enough for Lao Tse's disciple, Chwang-tse. "Mighty," said he, "is he who conquers himself. To the good I would be good: to the not-good I would also be good in order to make them good. Use the light that is in you to revert to your natural clearness of sight."

The modern forms of Taoism have been degraded by an alliance with alchemy, begetting a fantastic quest for the philosopher's stone and the elixir of immortality; and the influence of Buddhism has further modified its original character. But its moral teaching has still many sound features, if we may judge by the very popular "Book of Rewards and Punishments," translated first by Rémusat and then by Julien. It aims at producing a life of disinterested benevolence, and rebukes all selfishness, falsehood, and cruelty, with stories illustrating all kinds of offences down to frightening birds asleep on trees, destroying their nests or breaking their eggs. The same type is presented in some of the legends of the gods, such as "the High Emperor of the Sombre Heavens." When he comes to the throne he begins by distributing the funds of the treasury among the poor and the homeless, the halt and the blind. At length, being perfected in goodness, he ascends to heaven to enjoy everlasting life. But he cannot abandon his people to sin and sorrow, and he descends to earth eight hundred times to become the companion of the common people and teach them the truth. Then he makes another series of eight hundred descents to heal the sick; a third of similar number to exercise redeeming grace in the hells; and a fourth to endure suffering patiently, and give his life again and again, that his pain may be a spring of joy and righteousness to many hearts. But here Taoism speaks with the voice of its sister religion, Buddhism.

Third of the religions of the Chinese Empire is the faith of the Buddha. Hardly traceable in the Flowery Land before the year 67 A.D., its introduction was followed by a burst of missionary effort, when Hindus, Parthians, Huns, and men of various races, rich and poor, prince and mendicant, faced the enormous difficulties of travel "moved by a desire to convert the world." Then came the reverse journeys of the Chinese pilgrims with their precious records of observation in India, made known to us first by Rémusat and Julien, and subsequently in English by Beal and Legge. They traversed the great central deserts on the "roof of the world," they crossed the glaciers of the Himālaya to spend laborious years among the ten thousand students at the University of Nālanda, or in other centres of Buddhist learning, and slowly qualify themselves by the study of Sanskrit to convey the truth to their own people. The records of their labour are almost incredible, and the products of their industry are colossal, nor was native composition neglected. The first Chinese catalogue of the sacred collection, dated 520 A.D., mentions as many as 2,213 distinct works. Between this date and 1737 no less than twelve revisions of the canon were effected under imperial order. The first printed edition, under the Emperor Thai-tsu, 960–975 A.D., required 130,000 wooden blocks (Chinese printing, like European, began without moveable type). To the edition of the last century the Emperor himself, following the example of some of his predecessors, contributed the Preface. The collection in the India Office Library contains 1,662 separate titles; and Dr. Edkins estimates the extent of the Chinese canon at 700 times the size of the Bible. The translation of one single Sanskrit group by Hiouen Tsiang (629-645 A.D.) is reckoned by Beal to contain eighty times as much as the whole New Testament.

It is difficult even for the most laborious scholar to thread his way through such gigantic labyrinths. Yet the glimpses which have been vouchsafed by Professor Beal on the speculative and devotional sides, and by Dr. Edkins on the practical, are in the highest degree suggestive. During the nineteen centuries of its existence in China, Buddhism has been again and again opposed, and sometimes persecuted: it has again and again revived and reasserted its power. At the close of the thirteenth century, a census reckoned 42,318 temples. The second emperor of the present dynasty, Kang Hi (1661-1721), who varied his success in arms by devotion to literary and scientific study under Jesuit guidance, issued the famous "Sacred Edict" in which Buddhism was bitterly denounced. This edict, it is said, is still in force, and is even read fortnightly at every new and full moon in the temple of the patron god of every Chinese city by the town-clerk, in presence of the local government officers.

It is part of the terrible decay of modern China that old forms are thus perpetuated from which all vitality has disappeared. Moreover, like other religions ranging through nearly two millenniums, Buddhism in China has had its sects, its reformers, its philosophical schools, its favourite devotions. There is the interesting type of Buddhist quietism, founded by Lo at the beginning of the European reformation. He would have no ceremonies or outward show. His disciples chanted no prayers, burned no incense, lighted no candles, served no images: they sought to practise stillness of the interior life, and reverence for the all-pervading Buddha. There is again the subjective idealism which asserts that "every phenomenon is the manifestation of mind," and extricates itself from the difficulty that this leads to the doctrine "that there is a true personal 'I' diffused throughout the whole universe" by affirming the unreality of the world as we know it. The Buddha is the eternal self-subsisting Mind, and all exist only in and through him. There is in another field the devotion to Amitābha in the hope of attaining the Western Paradise, with its stress on invocation, meditation, and faith. There is the remarkable worship of Kwan Yin (the equivalent of the Sanskrit Bodhisattva named Avalokiteśvara*) with its solemn litany (1412 A.D.), its penetrating confessions of sin, and its prayers that all men may attain perfect wisdom, and every creature win deliverance from the bondage of transmigration; and there are the strange rites of modern times on behalf of the dead, which are so generally performed that a modern observer has computed the annual cost throughout the Empire at no less a sum than £32,000,000.

The singular position of the three religions in China makes it difficult to determine the actual number of the adherents of each. The entire population is sometimes reckoned as Buddhist, for probably every family celebrates some Buddhist rites. But the state religion is Confucian, and the masses at least often join in Taoist practices. The fact is that the three are by no means regarded as mutually exclusive. When strangers meet, observed the Abbé Huc, it is the custom for each to ask his neighbour "To what sublime religion do you belong?" The first is perhaps a Confucian, the second a Taoist, the third a disciple of the Buddha. Each then begins a panegyric on the religion not his own; after which they repeat in chorus "Religions are many, reason is one, we are all brothers." This view is not modern, it is many centuries old. "The teaching of the sects," said Lu Shun Yang, a distinguished Buddhist scholar, "is not different. The large-hearted man regards them as embodying the same truths. The narrow-minded man observes only their differences."

The nineteenth-century student of Comparative Religion may think the declaration of the "large-hearted" man a little premature. But he is unquestionably nearer the spiritual reality of that Wisdom which "in all ages, entering into holy souls, maketh them friends of God, and prophets." J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

ISRAEL AND EGYPT.

SIR,—The admirable papers on the "Achievements of the Century" are well deserving pamphlet form; would they not make good propagandist material? But I note Mr. Carpenter is inclined to doubt Egyptian influence on Hebrew literature, and says "No one would attempt to connect the morality of the Ten Commandments with the confessions of the soul in the sanctuary of Osiris." He further thinks Egypt's ancient faith had little share in modern religion. While a little above he implies that the ideas embodied in the "Book of Dead" "left not a trace on Israel."

May I ask if this can be supported? When we find that the confessions referred to include "I have not stolen," "I have not neglected God in my heart," "I have made no one weep"; when we learn that the "Book of the Dead" declares three duties are incumbent on man—to love God, to love virtue, and to love one's fellow man; when we read that to honour one's father and mother that one's days may be long in the land was a command current in Egypt 6,000 years ago, or 1,500 years before the time of Moses, we do ask ourselves if it was possible these ideas could leave no trace on Israel!

It is by no means proved beyond dispute that the Israelites ever lived in Egypt as described in Exodus, or left there suddenly. But the Tel-el-Amarna tablets show that about 1400 B.C. Canaan was subject to Egypt; and the Hebrew writings tell of the numerous alliances the Israelites, in after years, sought to make with that country. In this connection we have also to remember the probable date when the Decalogue was framed. This was so late as to admit of Egyptian influence. And surely the strict injunctions which hedged round the observance of the Sabbath must have been influenced by the similar strictness with which the Egyptians ordered their annual Sabbath to be observed. And from whence, but Egypt, did the Israelites get the sacred "Seven"?

The Book of Job bears unmistakable signs of an acquaintance with Egypt; see the Phœnix of xxix. 18, and the clay of x. 9 (see infra); while many of his protestations in xxix. and xxxi. are in the identical words of an inscription in Arabia, made long before that time by one of the Pharoahs.

The "Book of the Dead" says "God is life, and through Him only man liveth. He giveth life to man, and He breatheth the breath of life into man's nostrils." With this compare Genesis ii. 7.

The god Khnemu is sculptured at Philæ fashioning man upon a potter's wheel; compare Job x. 9, Isaiah lxiv. 8, and Jer. xviii. 6. Chapter cxxv. speaks of the god as Discerner of hearts and Searcher of the reins; compare Psalms vii. 9, xxvi. 2; Jer. xi. 20, xvii. 10, and Job xvi. 13. The Text of Unas (3300 B.C.) says 'Every evil word or thing hath been done away"; compare Psalm li. 9.

Mr. St. Clair, in his clever book "Creation Records," tells us that the inconsistencies between stellar reckoning and the Egyptian Calendar were symbolically referred to as the submerging of the earth and consequent destruction of mankind; this parallels the Noachian deluge. Osiris was set floating on the seventeenth day of the month Athyr; this is the date given in Genesis vii. 11. These coincidences are surely not all accidental?

One important consideration remains. If Egyptian influence did bear on Hebrew literature, how is it that the momentous doctrine of the future life of the soul is not even alluded to in the Old Testament? The two, or perhaps three, allusions in the very late prophetical books are of course due to Persian influence; while Psalm xvi. 9, 10 are believed to be directly due to Egyptian metaphysics. The entire silence of the Old Testament (the Endor episode is valueless) as to a future life has puzzled many theologians. Bishop Warburton based his argument in favour of the divine origin of Leviticus on the fact that it did not contain a revelation of a future world; Archbishop Whateley endorsed this view; and both agreed that the Book of Job did not teach a life after death! But this does not satisfy critics; if Moses was "learned in all the learning of the Egyptians," how is it their great cardinal doctrine was ignored by him? Was it because he was not versed in all their learning, or because no such man ever lived? Or was it that if he taught it the teaching was quite forgotten when the old legends took written form?

ATHANASIUS AND ARIUS.

SIR,—An interesting light is thrown on Dr. Welldon's statement with reference to Dr. Martineau's view of the Athanasian controversy by an incident which took place at a meeting of the Christian Union on Nov. 22, 1894. Two papers had been read on "Christian Definitions" (I am not sure of the exact title), and in the discussion which followed, the chairman (Mr. Justice Stirling), noticing the presence of Dr. Martineau, invited him to speak. The invitation was accepted, and the doctor insisted (1) in the interest of truth, on the necessity of getting behind the mythology which has grown around the origins of Christianity; (2) in the interest of religion, on the fundamental truths in the teaching, and the unique significance of the person of Jesus, which are left to us after the critical process has been applied. Then, referring to the way in which those who dissent from orthodox Christianity were at that time (of the London School Board Election) being treated, he said with great feeling and in that pathetic tone which his hearers knew so well, "Though we may be disowned and cast out from the fellowship by our contemporaries, we can find solace in the companionship of Locke and Newton, of Milton and Channing." The word and manner produced a marked effect on the meeting. In the further discussion one of the speakers, with great deference, begged to ask Dr. Martineau what, in his opinion, would have been the result to Christianity had the victory in the Athanasian controversy been on the other side. The doctor replied: "I do not hesitate to say that it was a good thing that Athanasius triumphed." I do not think he entered fully into the matter, but my impression is that, while himself agreeing with neither Arius nor Athanasius, he considered the higher and more fruitful ultimate truth was with the latter. In closing the discussion, the Chairman said he could not resist the force of Dr. Martineau's plea, and with warm indignation repudiated the action of those who were for calling in question his Christianity and that of his fellow-believers.

I write from memory only, and do not profess, therefore, to quote the precise words used, but I am sure of the main fact. I believe there were two or three other readers of THE INQUIRER present, who may be able to confirm, or correct, my impression of that memorable occasion.

THE MYSTERY OF GOD.

SIR,—The curious revival of interest in the old alternative, Arian or Athanasian? seems singularly out-of-date to some of us, who wonder how long it will be before we cease to talk of God as though He were one of us. For good or evil, we are drifting past the old anthropomorphic pictures of God. He is not a subject for pictures; and surely all debates or definitions that turn upon His personality are vain. Hence the utter hollowness now of the old arithmetical anti-trinitarian crusade. Hence, too, the hollowness of all the controversies concerning the Father and the Son as individuals. We have passed on to a vast universalism which will determine all the old controversies concerning God, Revelation, Inspiration, Incarnation, Sonship with God and Salvation in an entirely different way. In Our Father's Church we say "God is ever the Ideal, the best in all things everywhere, the ceaseless Creator, the inmost uplifting life of all things." In a sense, and a profound sense too, a grain of sand is a Son of God, and He is incarnate in the weed that peeps from a crevice in the wall. We are aware of Him, and He is aware of us every instant and at every turn. To discuss, then, whether He is three or one, or three in one, or thirty-three millions in one, can only be misleading. Arithmetic has nothing to do with it. He is; and we know not what He is, or how He is; and, apparently, we cannot know. We only know that in Him we and all things live and move and have our being. So far, then, perhaps Athanasius had the best of it, but only because, in a way, he kept open the road for the union, or even the identification, of the human and Divine. All we have to do is to make that a constant which he made an incident, and to treat that as universal which he confined to Christ.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

JUST now I was reading one of the wonder-stories of the New Testament. No doubt you all know it—the feeding of the crowd that had gone out into the wilderness to hear Jesus, and how he made a little into much.

In these wonder-stories one may often see a great deal of the person about whom they are told, and there is a great deal of Jesus in this one. First there is the kind way in which he thought of other people. He had been talking with people—teaching them—all day long, and no doubt he was tired himself. And it would have been so natural for him to have been thinking, "Now I hope these people will remember what I have said, and get some good from it, and will go home and practise it." But he was not thinking this. He was thinking instead, how hungry they must be. Not how tired and hungry he himself was, but how tired and hungry they were.

Nor does he seem to have said to himself, "Now I will make bread enough to feed them all," but he begins inquiring how much food his disciples have, or can find. It was only a little, but still he seems to think it will be best to make that little go round as far as it can.

And he loves order, and knows that nothing is so wasteful as confusion. So the crowd is seated quietly, in a grassy place—just as many a little crowd of Sunday scholars has been seated this Whitweek, waiting for buns and milk to be served. And then he asks God's blessing. He knows that a thankful heart will do more than anything else to turn little into much. So they begin to share with one another, and then the wonder happens. They find there is enough for all—and more than enough. Great basketfuls are left over. There is actually more than at first.

Did you ever see anything happen at all like that? I think I have. What is strange is that wonderful things much like this are happening all the time, and no one notices them any more than the crowd who ate that day. They did not seem at all surprised by it. And even the disciples did not remember it as extraordinary.

The main point I want you to notice in this story is, that there seemed to be so little of what every one was wanting, not enough to go round. But when they shared it, it did go round, and there was even some left.

There are a great many things that every one wants, and yet there seems to be only a little of them, not enough for everybody. Money, leisure, education, work—how many we can think of! Naturally we all try to keep them for ourselves. Pleasure is one of these things. We all want it for ourselves. Let us think for a moment of Jesus' way of turning little into much in our pleasure.

A little brother and sister were playing together, and the little sister took up her brother's engine, the very newest, the one he liked best. "Oh, mother, Hilda has got my engine. Tell her to put it down. She'll break it!" He thought, you see, that his engine only held pleasure enough for one, and that was himself.

"Let her have it, dear," said the mother. "I don't think she will break it, but if she does I will buy you another." So the little boy let his sister play with his engine. In five minutes both were as happy as possible, and the little boy was exclaiming, "Oh, mother, look; just see what sister can do with my engine!" There was really pleasure enough for both of them in the engine as soon as they began to share it. There was actually more for two than for one.

A little boy was riding up and down the garden walks on his tricycle horse. Two more little boys came to play with him. "I had better put my horse away," he said; "three boys can't ride one horse."

"But you might call it a railway train," said mother, "and one of you could be engine-driver, and one signal-man, and the other station-master, or passenger. So the garden-roller became the station, and the apple-tree a signal-post, and I can't tell you how much fun the three boys had. There was soon so much more pleasure for the three than anyone of them could have got out of the tricycle horse alone.

Pleasure grows by sharing it. It does not become less—but more. It is like the loaves and fishes in the story. The more it is passed round the more there is left.

And, best of all, this is a wonder which can be produced over and over again. It never fails, and it never wears out. You can do this miracle yourself.

I daresay you have done it many times without thinking of it. Don't learn the evil lesson so many learn as they grow older. Don't try to keep pleasure to yourself. Share it, share it, and it will grow, and for all that you have given, your own heart will be full. Yes, strange as it seems, it will be fuller.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bury.—The June number of the "Bank-street Chapel and Sunday-school Circular" is notable as the hundredth issue, the first having appeared in October, 1889. If anyone possesses a set of the "Bury Unitarian Circular," issued in the early years of the late John Wright's ministry, the editor of the "Calendar" will be glad to hear of it. The following note on "Our Veteran Teachers" is of special interest:—At the annual meeting of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, at Bolton, on Good Friday, a special feature of the business meeting was the presentation by the retiring president, Mr. C. C. Grundy, of handsome bronze, silver, and silver-gilt medals to Sunday-school workers whose services range from twenty to over fifty years. Three of our veterans were recipients of medals—namely, Mr. Thomas Holt, 44 years; Mr. W. Holt, 35 years; Mr. Joseph Taylor, 30 years. By some misapprehension or error in the returns asked for, some names of Bury teachers were omitted which well deserve a place upon the list—namely, Miss M. E. Grundy, 28 years; Miss Wilde, 20 years; Mr. W. Stephenson, 40 years; Mr. F. Crawshaw, 27 years; Mr. Leonard Wilde, 26 years; Mr. Edward Stephenson, 26 years; Mr. Joseph Wilde, 25 years. A promise has been made that these omissions will shortly be set right. Our Sunday-school owes no small part of its present prosperity to the long-sustained and untiring devotion of those who have given much of the vigour of their best years to this department of Christian work.

Devonport (Appointment).—The Rev. E. Robinson Hughes, of Aberdare, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Devonport congregation to become their minister, and will commence his pastorate on the first Sunday in August.

Evesham.—Two additional memorial windows of stained glass have recently been placed in the Oat-street Chapel. The first, having in the centre the figure of a little child, with the words, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth," is in memory of Geoffrey Roscoe New, son of Mr. and Mrs. Geoffrey New. It comes from the studio of Miss M. J. Newill, of Birmingham. The second window, funds for which were raised by subscriptions from his former pupils and other friends, is in memory of Mr. William Hunting, formerly for a long time superintendent of the Sunday-school. In the centre is the Tree of Life, with a scroll around it bearing the words, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days;" and below is the inscription: "This window is erected to the memory of William Hunting, for twenty-two years Superintendent of the Oat-street Sunday-school, by members and friends of the school." Messrs. Eaton and Bulfield, of Lancaster, designed and manufactured this window. There are now five memorial windows in the chapel. From the remaining five windows the congregation have removed the sheets of ground glass surrounded by a violent blue, erecting in their place lattice windows of soft shades of green and grey. During the last three years other improvements have been made in the chapel by the congregation. A new and larger vestry has been built; the heating is by hot-water pipes instead of a stove; the lighting by standard incandescent gas burners, instead of a star of ordinary gas jets suspended from the centre of the roof; the dust-collecting cocoanut matting has been replaced by cork kamptulicon; and at a cost of £130 the organ has been enlarged by the addition of a swell organ and seven new stops.

Horsham.—The 127th Whit-Sunday anniversary was celebrated on June 3, at the Free Christian Church, the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, of Bridgwater, being the preacher. The congregation included a good number of friends from Billingshurst and other neighbouring churches. The morning sermon was from the words: "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with the Lord," spoke of the oneness of the saintly life, possible under all conditions of creed and ritual and independent of them all. The evening sermon on "The larger Fellowship of Religion" was also broad and generous in tone, telling how the way to God lies through the service of man, and how the true communion of spirit embraces all seeking souls During the afternoon a public meeting was held, when the chair was taken by Mr. S. C. Burgess (senior deacon), who, in his opening address, spoke of the helpfulness of these anniversary meetings, and the pleasure he felt in doing anything that lay in his power to help the Unitarian cause. Messrs. Tarving and Price briefly, but cordially, offered a welcome to the visitors. Mr. Edwin Ellis responded, and suggested to ministers that their pulpit ministrations would gain in force and power if they associated themselves more closely with everyday life, mixed freely with their fellows, used homely similies to bring high truths within their ken. He spoke of his own indebtedness to, and high esteem for various members of the profession; and of the influence exercised over his own business life by some words addressed to the merchants of Liverpool, by the late James Martineau, then a young man. An earnest little address on the words, "Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward" followed, given by the Rev. George Lansdown, of Billingshurst; and a few words from the Revs. T. B. Broadrick and J. J. Marten concluded the meeting.

Leeds: Mill-hill.—The scholars connected with the Mill-hill Schools (numbering about 300), with the teachers and a goodly muster of parents and friends, assembled in the Priestley Hall on Whit-Monday. In the absence of the Rev. Charles Hargrove, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., one of the superintendents, presided. Mrs. Ferro, the wife of another superintendent, herself formerly a teacher in the school, presented the prizes for good conduct, &c., during the past year, and gave an admirable address. Cordial thanks were given to Mrs. Ferro, on the motion of Mr. Fred. Clayton, seconded by Mrs. F. W. Kitson, of Burley. The scholars were then conveyed in vans to Southfield, Mr. Talbot's residence, where tea on the lawn was followed by sports, and a large number of prizes awarded. At the end of the proceedings, in response to a hearty vote of thanks, Mr. Talbot remarked that it was forty-five years since the Mill-hill scholars first came to those grounds, at the invitation of his father, and he might add that on the present occasion a representative of the fourth generation had been with them.

Sunderland.—A meeting was held in the church on Wednesday, May 30, to welcome the Rev. Francis Wood. After tea Mr. J. G. Stirling took the chair, when Mr. J. Rutherford, on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. H. French, on behalf of the Sunday-school, offered a welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Wood. The Revs. W. H. Lambelle and A. Harvie joined in the welcome, and delivered encouraging addresses. In responding, Mr. Wood said he came to Sunderland with hopes and fears, but he must say his hopes were stronger than his fears, and he trusted that the church's influence would steadily increase. During the evening musical selections were rendered by the choir and other friends.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE have not yet received full accounts of the meetings of the American Unitarian Anniversaries; deferring perforce our notice of them, they will have the wider welcome next week when the pressure of matter from our own meetings is relieved. Meanwhile, northern friends will not forget their special rallying point at the Provincial Assembly Meeting, to be held on Thursday next at Liverpool. A strong programme has been provided, and the calendar has afforded it the longest day of the year. An excellently conceived booklet for the use of visitors is issued by the Liverpool Booksellers' Company (70, Lord-street).

ON Monday morning a World's Temperance Congress was opened at the Medical Examination Hall, near Waterloo Bridge, and it has been attended very numerously. The opening sessions at the Hall were largely historical, but in the evening a public meeting was held at the City of London Schools under the chairmanship of the Archbishop of Canterbury, President of the Congress. The following manifesto was unanimously adopted :—

The President of the Congress congratulates the members thereof now present, and the various temperance organisations that have sent them here, on the noble record of what has been done in the past, and the sure hopes that it is now possible to entertain for the future. The temperance cause is specially distinguished by this characteristic, that though it has moved and is still moving very slowly, it has never yet gone back in its steady progress. It has won its way in science, in religion, in politics, in general public opinion. It has not yet achieved a final triumph, but it has silenced most of the objections which long hindered its advance; it has made ridicule ridiculous; it has reversed the arguments founded on what is necessary for health, for steady labour, for long life; it has put an end to the charge of being an eccentricity; it has compelled a great trade to admit that the fruits of that trade as now carried on are a gigantic evil, and the one argument that still holds its ground, that the use of intoxicants contributes to human enjoyment, is beginning to lose its force as we contrast the misery of the home of the drunkard with the happiness of the home of the sober. But there still remains one enemy to be encountered that is much more difficult to deal with than all the enemies we have encountered yet, and that is the indifference of men in general, and even of very good men, to the duty of helping our fellows who have yielded or are in danger of yielding to this most terrible temptation. To those who have studied the subject, it is a cause of unending astonishment that there should be so many to pass the whole matter quietly by. We earnestly appeal to all who have any sense of duty to look into the question for themselves, and then decide whether they can disregard it any longer. There are undoubtedly other sins which may be pronounced more mean, more polluting, more deadly, but assuredly no other so terribly mischievous. Look, we beseech you, and judge, and then ask your consciences whether it is possible to stand aloof and leave the evil to take its course.

ON Tuesday some highly important papers and scientific demonstrations were given by medical men, Professor G. Sims Woodhead, professor of pathological chemistry at Cambridge, being president of the Science section of the Congress. He said text-books of medicine gave the very best temperance lectures one could have. Alcohol in excess was one of the most potent factors in producing disease. But alcoholism, short of drunkenness, gave rise to a number of nerve diseases. There were also well-known diseases of the liver and of the heart produced by alcohol. All observers—not teetotallers—agreed that not more than a certain amount could be taken without evil, and that quantity was always diminishing. Alcohol was never necessary for perfectly healthy people—a fact which he said was acknowledged by all who had worked at the question. He admitted that some said it might do a little good as a drug, but he himself believed that for lowering the temperature, quinine and anti-pyrin were better. All were convinced that if used in excess it was an evil, but at some period of their lives, people who used it would certainly have to pay for it, for it drew upon the reserves of strength. Mr. W. S. Caine reported on Lord Roberts's testimony that the temperance movement had added two battalions of effective men to the Army, and saved the Indian revenues no less than £400,000 per annum. Colonel Ferguson also testified on Wednesday to the great improvement of the soldiers' health and general condition owing to the spread of temperance in the ranks, and while this is no doubt due, in India at least, to the temperance rooms provided through Lord Roberts's efforts in every canteen there, Colonel Ferguson attributes the improvement largely to Bands of Hope and other juvenile societies. The importance of educating the young people on the subject was emphasised by many speakers at the Congress.

THE Rev. Alexander Webster, of Aberdeen, who is experiencing some ill-treatment from a certain section of his fellow-citizens on account of his supposed opinions on the war, will hardly need to be assured of the sympathy of his many friends and admirers. The great work he is doing for liberal Christianity in Scotland may be judged by the report given in our "News of the Churches" this week, which will, we venture to say, surprise those who have not realised Mr. Webster's powers as an out-door preacher. The fact is that for a long series of years he has attracted enormous congregations in this way, and after all necessary deductions have been made for casual listeners and the like, there must remain a good solid bulk of the population of Aberdeen who look to him as their teacher. It is not creditable to the town that a gentleman of such recognised position should be subject to the assault of a band of young rowdies as described by the Daily Free Press; still more deplorable is it that his wife should have been hurt by the stone-throwers. "They know not what they do," must still be pleaded for them; but Aberdeen must teach them and so protect her own good name.

THE interesting suggestion recently made by Professor A. Harnack with respect to the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews is one which merits attention, not only on account of the learned author's reputation, but for the consequences which follow, if it may be at all depended upon. The essay containing it appeared in the first issue (March) of the Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde des Urchristentums (Parkes and Co., Oxford). It is entitled "Probabilia," &c., and the author takes refuge behind this modest description from the assaults of derisive critics. The grounds on which his conjectural conclusion has been reached are set forth with some detail, and are of a delicately critical nature. Roughly, we may say Professor Harnack considers it certain that the Epistle was addressed to a domestic circle of Christians in Rome, and that the author originally belonged to this circle in a position of authority as a teacher and leader. A peculiar feature is found in the use of "we" and "I" by the author, the alternative plural and singular seeming to point to special circumstances in the authorship. Without going further into the argument, which is cumulative, it is impossible to judge fairly of its strength; we can only add here that Professor Harnack hazards the suggestion, which he says increasingly commends itself to him, that the Epistle is not by Barnabas, or Luke, or Apollo—Paul is out of the question—but by one or both of the honoured pair of Roman Christians, known from Acts as experts in teaching and credited with important labours by the last chapter of Romans—Aquila and Priscilla (or as Romans gives it "Prisca"). Professor Harnack has discovered and sets forth some striking early manuscript evidence showing how early and how strongly a certain repugnance set in with regard to the position of "Prisca" as a teacher; and in this current of feeling he finds the reason why before the end of the second century the name of the author was, as Origen confessed, hopelessly lost. It would be asking too much that Professor Harnack should have solved the problem to everybody's satisfaction; but those who wish to hear a woman's accent among those of the most ancient and influential of Christian teachers may seize this as a favourable opportunity. A friend suggests that the theory will stand a better chance coming from the sober Harnack than if Renan, the romantic, had propounded it!

The Viceroy of India, Lord Curzon, has sent a very strong appeal to the Lord Mayor of London on behalf of the famine-stricken Indians. He draws a most heart-rending picture of the afflicted population, the numbers of which far exceed the record of previous famines in the time of British control of the Peninsula. The claims of the sufferers by the South African War have not, indeed, dried up the springs of pity for India, but the flow has been sadly checked; and we shall all rejoice if Lord Curzon's letter not only stirs up the benevolent to greater zeal, but rouses the selfish rich—of whom we appear to have a huge supply, to judge by the crowds that flock to the fashionable race-courses. But is not the case one for Imperial benevolence? Are we only able to vote millions to provide munitions of war, and not to save the starving multitudes of the East?

THE REVIEWS.

The war naturally furnishes the theme of many of the articles again this month. We hardly seem to have come to a period of sober reflection as yet, however; and judging by the current articles, that time is still far off. In the Nineteenth Century a description by the late Captain Cecil Boyle is given of "The Cavalry Rush to Kimberley," which, while spirited, is happily free from the "high-falutin'" style of much newspaper correspondence. The author was killed a few days after the capture of Cronje which he describes. Two other articles in the same review supply some evidence from the spot: the first as to Natal opinion, the writer being Mr. F. S. Tatham, a member of the Legislative Assembly; the second, by the Rev. J. S. Moffat, deals with the condition and prospects of the "native races." Poor "races"—they are likely to fare ill, when the whites treat each other badly. The only articles dealing with religious or ecclesiastical subjects are Dr. Cobb's on the "Prospects of Anglicanism," and Mr. Wilfrid Ward's on "Liberalism and Intransigeance"; neither of them seems very noteworthy to us. A brief article by Professor Robert K. Douglas, entitled "The Intellectual Awakening of China," describes the work of a society for diffusing Western literature in China; apparently it has met with great success. A refreshing defence of Handel's genius (by Mr. H. H. Statham) against the criticisms of fashionable folk, and an essay on "The Vogue of the Garden Book," by Mrs. S. Batson, lighten the programme of articles, and are wise as well as attractive.

In the Contemporary three war articles open, and two "high political" articles close; of the latter, that by Mr. Herbert Paul, on "A Top-Heavy Administration," is, like most of Mr. Paul's work, full of fireworks, rather fatiguing, but very clever. The remaining six articles include one on educational subjects by Professor Withers, a very pungent and forcible article by the Rev. Thomas Holmes, on "Youthful Offenders and Parental Responsibility"—which should open the eyes of a good many people and lead to wiser methods—and one by "Fidelis" on "A Convert's Experiences of the Catholic Church." The writer of the last-named, while deploring the late Dr. Mivart's style of criticism on the Church, evidently comes pretty near him in sympathy. One wonders how so sensible a man can withstand the force of Dr. Mivart's final appeal from Rome to reason. Mr. Matthias Dunn tells some amazing stories of "Cuttle-fishes," and the Countess Martinengo-Cæsaresco deals with the legends of St. Francis and the animal world; and another lady, Edith Sellers, describes a very notable experiment in Berlin in the formation of a "People's Theatre" at really popular prices. Is it not possible for London to supply as good an article for its toilers, who also need refreshment and education of this kind?

DR. MARTINEAU AND UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.*

BY THE REV. EDWIN ODGERS, M.A.

When the Committee of this Association asked me to address you on "Dr. Martineau and Unitarian Christianity," I could not but be aware that the subject was a large one; for it may be said, and truly, that there was no part and no activity, of his long life, which did not concern Unitarian Christianity. It was obvious at the outset that I must exclude all attempt to speak of Martineau as philosopher, and equally, that I must refrain from biographical notes and personal reminiscences. I hoped, however, to speak of the relation of his progressive thought to Unitarian doctrine, and of his attitude with regard to Unitarianism ecclesiastical—i.e., to the churches and institutions generally designated Unitarian. The time at my disposal, however, only permits me to deal with the first of these subjects; and in so doing, I have mainly endeavoured to trace the line of Martineau's theological development from those earlier phases of doctrine, with which my hearers may not be so familiar, to those later views of religion with which his name is associated before the world, and which have become familiar to most of us as elements of our daily thought.

When in 1828, at the age of twenty-three, Martineau was ordained by the synod of Munster, as assistant to the Rev. Phillip Taylor, of Eustace-street, Dublin, he made his entrance into a theological atmosphere which was wholly Arian. Arianism had by this time been left with hardly a representative among English Presbyterians. Priestley had passed through it and left it, before the time of his great influence among them; and it was largely due to him and Lindsey that Socinianism had generally supplanted it. Let me remind you of the main differences between these schemes. According to the Arian, Christ, or the Son, is a Divine Being, but with a derived Deity: created, pre-existent, but not co-eternal with the Father: incarnate in Jesus, yet not of two natures: who could really die, and whose death was a condition of man's salvation (though the language of substitution was avoided). The Arian paid worship to Christ. He was intensely scriptural. His boast was that he could use, of his Christ, all the Christological language of Scripture; and it was just, for the whole conception was built up expressly for that purpose. The Socinian view was Adoptionist; its Christ was not pre-existent, save in the purpose of God, and started, though miraculously, upon the plane of humanity: but was elevated by God's commission and endowment to be Messiah, Mediator, Son, and at last received a true Godhead, and is, therefore, properly worshipped. The English Unitarian, properly so-called, protested against this final step, as Davidis had done in the days of Socinus himself. Lindsey had left the Church mainly on the ground that the Son is not a proper object of worship. He taught that, as against Trinitarian and Arian alike, the Unitarian stands for the worship of the One True God—a jarring note to our ears, as if it criticised the prayers of other men; but he himself was extremely shocked when Priestley gave up the miraculous birth. Now Martineau says: "My youthful religion was entirely of the type of Dr. Priestley's." Between the ages of fourteen and sixteen he had been a pupil of Dr. Lant Carpenter, and was with him again, as assistant in his school, for a year, between leaving Manchester College, York, and going to his Dublin ministry. He had been trained by Dr. Carpenter to reverence the names of Hartley and Priestley, and was deeply imbued with their characteristic philosophy (the doctrines known as Association, Materialism, Necessarianism). It was long before he renounced his allegiance to these, yet already in his school days he had been brought into contact with influences which were destined to disturb the calm of his determinism. He was introduced by Dr. Carpenter to the early writings of Channing—writings like his "Lectures on the Evidences," which do not strike us now as being of any particular significance; but this preliminary acquaintance led Martineau to welcome Channing's more distinctive and personal utterances, and to be deeply moved by them, while as yet they were little known in England, or, where known, were greeted, as he tells us, with "bitter and contemptuous criticism." Again, while at school, he had become acquainted, entirely of his own motion, with some of the literature of Evangelical piety, which revealed to him experiences, notably in the sense of sin, and stirred in him depths of feeling, which had been wholly undreamed of in his philosophy, and which, when he saw them at a later day interpreted by Channing's teaching of moral responsibility, led him to burst the bonds of Necessarianism and guided him towards the foundation of his later philosophy in the spiritual relation of man and God. This conjunction seems to me to have determined the fact that it is from Man as criterion of ethical and theological systems that Martineau proceeds in all his thinking. All his ethical criticism is a declaration that you cannot make Man fit into this space or that which you happen to have left for him when you have completed your metaphysical or scientific Kosmos. As he naïvely says: "Our personality is sure to recover from the most ingenious philosophy."

* An Address given on Wednesday evening, June 6, at the British and Foreign Unitarian Anniversary Meetings, Essex Hall.

But there was another influence destined to be equally lasting, which Martineau carried away from Bristol to Dublin. I refer to that feeling of devotion to Christ as to a beloved person, which, if it did not originate in the teaching of Dr. Carpenter, was certainly fostered by it. Speaking long afterwards of the Doctor's New Testament lessons, he says: "An absorbing veneration for the person of Christ as supernatural filled the teacher's whole mind." This no doubt transfigured the somewhat diplomatic language in which older Unitarians were accustomed to speak of Christ, magnifying his offices and enumerating our obligations to him: the sort of language which in the case of some of us, never rolled up and vanished away till we caught the fire of Theodore Parker's enthusiasm for Jesus as a real man. In the "Declaration of Views" made at his ordination, Martineau passes on from what might have been expected as full recognition of the functions of Christ, to an expression of fervent loyalty which must, I think, have startled those who heard it by its tone of personal directness and intensity. As probably few who hear me have ever seen this address, I will venture on a somewhat lengthy quotation. After speaking of the revelation of God by patriarchs and prophets of old, and more gloriously by Jesus Christ His well-beloved Son, he continued:—

"Him I acknowledge as Mediator between God and man, who was appointed to produce by his life, and yet more peculiarly by his death, an unprecedented change in the spiritual condition of mankind, and to open a new and living way of salvation. No pledge of Divine Love to the human race impresses me so deeply as the voluntary death of Jesus Christ, and his exaltation to that position which he now holds above all other created beings, where he lives for ever more, and from which he shall hereafter judge the world in righteousness. I receive and reverence him not merely for that sinless excellence which renders him a perfect pattern to our race, but as the commissioned delegate of Heaven, on whom the Spirit was poured without measure—as the chosen representative of the Most High, in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. As authorities for our duties, as fountains of consoling and elevating truth, Jesus and the Father are one; and in all subjects of religious faith and obedience, not to honour him as we honour the Father is to violate our allegiance to him as the great Captain of our salvation. When Jesus commands, I would listen as to a voice from Heaven; when he instructs, I would treasure up his teachings as the words of everlasting truth; when he forewarns of evil, I would take heed and fly as from impending ruin; when he comforts, I would lay my heart to rest as on the proffered mercy of God; when he promises, I would trust to his assurance as to an oracle of destiny."

Yet the only record, so far as I know, that Martineau has put into print concerning his Dublin ministry proves that the dogmatic basis of his Christology was found to be unsound and Socinian by some members of his Arian congregation. "So resolute was their aversion to any further step that on letting fall an expression implying the simple humanity of Christ I lost the most attached friend I had amongst my hearers, who took his household away from me with lamentation and tears."

During his four years' ministry in Dublin Martineau was mainly instrumental in founding the Irish Unitarian Society. He left in 1832, in consequence of his objection to receive the Regium Donum, which would naturally fall to him as successor on the death of his colleague. Soon after his removal to Paradise-street, Liverpool, where he commenced his ministry as assistant to the Rev. John Grundy, he preached the annual sermon before this Association on "The Existing State of Theology as an Intellectual Pursuit, and Religion as a Moral Influence" (1834). The mention of this naturally brings to mind his second Association sermon, preached in 1869, entitled "Three Stages of Unitarian Theology," in which the main lines of the evolution of his own thought and (in spite of the most careful suppression of the personal element) of his own leading in contemporary Unitarianism, are clearly and fully drawn. As I believe the separate edition of this sermon is readily obtainable, I shall not dwell upon it, but take my illustrations mainly from other sources. In Liverpool Martineau found himself in a freer air. Arianism of the Irish type had been dominant at Renshaw-street. Paradise-street had probably accepted the aggressive Unitarianism of Grundy. All around flourished an Evangelical Churchism of a pronounced Orange hue. Perhaps it was the fact that all these parties alike appealed to Scripture as final, and each one professed to be more scriptural than the other two, that induced Martineau to set before himself the inquiry—"What are the logical preliminaries for the settlement of the question, What is Christianity?" The result of this inquiry he embodied in a course of six lectures delivered on the last Sundays of the year 1835, and published under the title "The Rationale of Religious Enquiry; or, the Question stated, of Reason, the Bible, and the Church." This was Martineau's first book, and I cannot help regretting that it is not to be reprinted. It is excellent reading. It must have been a surprise to its contemporaries to find that Theology could be written in a style so keen, eloquent, thoughtful, and clear. The writer steps into the arena as a frank champion of Rationalism, in the sense, that he maintains the validity of the natural criteria of Revelation. He espouses at once that cause of reason which Locke had bequeathed to liberal Nonconformity, but which the scriptural character of the Unitarian controversy had tended to put into the background. A literary instinct and an historic sense emancipated Martineau from the fetters of a rigid Scripturalism, if indeed he had ever put them on. He states with some regret that he cannot follow Dr. Carpenter any more than he can follow Lindsey and Robberds in the use of language which implies a dictation to the individual, by or through Scripture, of a religious belief. The Unitarian attempt at a rational literalism is treated no less freely than the diverse prejudgments of the Calvinist and the German Antisupernaturalist; and all alike are reminded that the sole task of the interpreter is to reach the meaning of the author. The Lockian principle that revelation cannot supersede reason because reason must be the organ to which revelation is addressed, is carried to further applications, e.g., in the consideration of the natural improbability of a doctrine, the contradiction of natural religion involved in it, and the right of applying moral criticism to it. The conclusion to which we are led is this: it is impossible to attain to any conclusion more than rational: all is not over when we have the Scriptures in our hands, or when we have done our utmost to reach the ideas of their authors (and that is no light matter, for those who credit the maxim that the Bible is as plain as noon-day are confronted by the statement that "the Scriptures are a collection of writings singularly difficult to understand"); but then, the whole duty of forming your individual belief is before you. The Gospel records, written by men "uninspired but truthful," are found to contain, inseparable from their tissue, accounts of miracle. A rational Christianity must include this. Anti-supernaturalism is an illogical application of Rationalism; "nor is there any intelligible sense in which one who thinks that the preternatural can be banished from the birth and infancy of our faith, can continue to take the name of Christian.' Yet miracle is no short cut to faith; the' stress of authentication and proof cannot be laid upon it. It cannot supersede any mental or spiritual process. In the words of Locke, "The miracles are to be judged by the doctrine, not the doctrine by the miracles."

What effect was produced by the Rationale either in Liverpool or elsewhere I can find no means of judging. But I cannot help surmising that it was, if not the main cause still, a determining circumstance of the attempt made to extirpate Unitarianism by the joint action of thirteen Liverpool clergymen, who addressed a letter through one of their number "to all who call themselves Unitarians" in the town and neighbourhood, begging them to allow themselves to be snatched from the eternal peril in which the ministrations of Mr. Thom, Mr. Martineau, and Mr. Giles had involved them, and to attend a course of thirteen lectures designed to convince them of their blasphemous and deadly error. To the course of lectures thus inaugurated the three Unitarian ministers replied. This is the Liverpool Controversy of 1839, the records of which are to be found in two volumes entitled "Unitarianism Confuted" and "Unitarianism Defended." The books are monumental: the first, because it perfectly illustrates the way in which the battle of Orthodoxy will never again be fought by representatives of the Church of England; the second because while putting in its best form the Unitarian case up to that date, and dealing with a mass of minor questions which still separately arise as difficulties in the way of the theological inquirer, it constantly rises above the plane of mere advocacy and defence, and touches the permanent conditions of spiritual religion. Martineau's five lectures in this series present us with a singularly complete cycle of his views, and in them, with reference to what has preceded and what is to come, I note the following points:—The doctrines of Scripture, of reason, and of miracle are developments of those which we have already met in the Rationale; but miracle is now even less of a credential than it was; it is simply an awakening fact which may draw attention to a person or to a character. Gradations of evidential value are observed in the New Testament writings, while the Gospel of John is noted as more certainly authentic than the other three. Rationalism, in face of what are alleged to be theological mysteries, is carefully guarded against the assumption that it professes to find or to have "religion without mystery." This is pronounced to be a fatal caricature of Rationalism, while the sense of what we do not know is as essential to our religion as the impression of what we do know. But it is abuse of words to call the doctrine of the Trinity, for example, a mystery. To affirm that words precise and clear, but mutually contradictory, constitute a mystery, is a mere juggle. There may be occult qualities of things, but verbal mysteries cannot exist. Christianity is represented as the religion of personal responsibility; and appeal is made to human experience to prove the personal origin and personal identity of sin. In face of this, the doctrine of philosophical necessity, though defended from the charge of being a mere fatalism, is definitely renounced. The view of the functions and official character of Christ which I have marked as Socinian persists, with especial emphasis on the Messiahship. All who have been accustomed to use "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home" (1840) will remember how the word Messiah is intruded into the altered hymns. Here, speaking of the effect of the Messiah's death upon the minds of Jew and Gentile, Martineau says: "It is evident that the relations which I have described belonged to the death of Jesus in his capacity of Messiah, and could have had no existence if he had not borne this character, but had been merely a private martyr to his convictions."

But side by side with this, we find ourselves in the presence of language and ideas born of a wholly different Christology. We pass from the office to the character. The supreme revelation is not in the precept, but in the mind of Christ; we know God through him, not from what he tells us so much as from what he was; it is his spirit, not his work, that mediates between the Infinite and the finite: he shows us the Father. I gather together three or four sentences, standing apart in the fifth lecture of the series, and try to place them in an order which may show by what steps the lecturer had passed (to a greater degree, perhaps, than he was actually conscious of) from a Judeao-Christian view to a spiritual Logos-Doctrine:—

"It is as the type of God, the human image of the everlasting Mind, that Christ becomes an object of our faith.

"The peculiar office of Jesus is to show us, not to tell us, the spirit of that Being who spreads around us in Infinitude and leads us through Eternity. The Universe had prepared us for the scale of Deity, Christ has filled it with his own spirit; and we worship now not the cold intellectual Deity of natural religion . . . but one whose likeness is seen in Jesus of Nazareth, and whose portraiture, suffused with the tints of that soul, is impressed upon creation. . . . Let Messiah's mind pass forth to fill all time and space, and you behold the Father.

"Christ possessed and manifested all the moral attributes of Deity . . . these we conceive to have been compressed in Christ within the physical and intellectual limits of humanity; to have been unfolded and displayed amid the infirmities of a suffering and tempted nature."

In referring to the text, 1 Tim. iii. 16, "God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit," &c., Martineau remarks: "It is well known that in the most approved text the word God does not exist, and the passage reads 'He who was manifest in the flesh,' &c. Were it permitted to indulge personal wishes in such matters, I could desire that the common reading were the true one. I know no more exact description of Christ than that he was a living and human manifestation of the character of God."

From this time forward we have in Martineau's writing (with the exception, perhaps, of a period when the influence of Channing was particularly dominant) the echo of that note which Bishop Welldon recognises as truly Athanasian: not in any sense connected with the pseudo-Athanasian Creed, but in the sense of that great Father of the Church who gave to the doctrine of the Incarnation its spiritual interpretation in the words "God became human, that we might be made divine." Interpret this, not of a unique historical incident, but of a universal human fact, and you stand at the centre of that philosophy of religion which is specially Martineau's. Unfortunately I do not know the date of those sermons on "Christ the Divine Word" ("Hours of Thought," vol. 2) to which the Bishop refers, so I cannot accurately put them in their place in the line of this particular thought. But let me, in passing, heartily endorse the Bishop's remark that it is in Martineau's sermons that we truly see the man. Like John Wesley, he hated controversy. In his sermon before this Association in 1834 he had said, "The attempts made in this country to bring controversy before popular tribunals, while they have made theology superficial, have rendered religion sectarian." He denounces "this disputatious trifling," and "the temper of sectarianism that seizes on every deformity of every creed, and exhibits its caricature to the world's gaze and aversion"; as he said later, "antipathy understands nothing." The Liverpool controversy could not be declined, but who that ever knew Martineau cannot in imagination hear him speak those words with which he opens the argumentative portion of that lecture from which I have already quoted: "I enter upon this miserable logomachy with the utmost repugnance; and am ashamed that, in vindication of the simplicity of Christ, we should be dragged back into the barren controversies of the schools." In his sermons he never disputed. It may seem surprising, but I record my own strong impression, that the philosopher who in the domain of philosophy was before all things a critic, who appears to me (I am no philosopher) to have been guided in the development of his own system more by the shortcomings than by the achievements of others, habitually excludes the note of dissonance from the stillness of the hour of worship, and speaks always as if all men were in the last resort at one before God. I remember perfectly well consulting him on the subject of doctrinal (I will not say controversial) lectures on Sunday evenings, and finding that in his view nothing of that sort could be taken on in connection with the prayers of the congregation. It must not be forgotten that, consistently with this opinion, he maintained throughout that no Church organisation or ecclesiastical combination can ever be founded on a doctrinal difference from others, but must find the thing it is to represent in the continuous life of worshipping congregations. Doctrinal exposition, the history of opinion, the differentia of Churches—all these things in his view belonged to the lecture-room and not to the pulpit. In his last sermon in Paradise-street Chapel he reminds his hearers that "every Sunday during our connection" he had his separate hour of instruction; his literary executors bear witness to the minute care with which he prepared for that important service to his people. Look the sermons through, and I think you will not find one that holds the attitude of debate: one that shows the spirit of advocacy or litigation: one that recognises a distribution of human souls into doctrinal classes or denominational pigeon-holes: one that quotes a line of another man's writing for the sake of pulling it to pieces. But owing to the systematic teaching of Mr. Thom and Mr.

Martineau, the Liverpool Unitarian could give a reason for the faith that was in him, in a manner which was shared by few of his co-religionists.

That Martineau's services in the Liverpool Controversy did not obtain much recognition among Unitarians generally was, I am inclined to think, due to the fact that, in accordance with his view of the church to which I have just alluded, he, and Mr. Tayler with him, had opposed the wishes of those who desired a definite Unitarian combination of churches into a Church, at the Aggregate Meeting of Unitarians held in London in the preceding year, 1838. How little he and Mr. Tayler were truly known in the south may be judged from the invention at that meeting of a convenient form of sound words with which for many years to come everything they wrote or said was, in certain quarters, modestly but firmly depreciated:—"Vague, German, and transcendental." This usage was in full swing when I came to London in 1859. But the late Mr. Wicksteed did not hesitate to allege a conspiracy of silence founded on theological misgivings. "Unitarianism Defended"—but

Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis!

Mr. Wicksteed's words are as follows:—

The controversy was reviewed in the principal Anglican periodicals, in the Eclectic and the Congregational; but in the periodicals circulating among Unitarians no review appeared. A short extract from the Liverpool Courier under the head of Intelligence, telling of the delivery of the first lecture by Mr. Thom, was given in the Reformer; after that it observed an ominous silence, and from that time to this (1877) no trace can be found in our literary chronicles of such a book as "Unitarianism Defended" having come into existence. The admissions and assertions that seem to us now so guarded, so inevitable, and so indispensable, were then contemplated by the older, and we are sorry to add, many of the younger men, with suspicion and alarm, as involving a too free, even a destructive criticism.

The years which elapsed between the Liverpool Controversy and the termination of Martineau's Liverpool ministry, in 1857, were fruitful in change and progress. I have alluded to his abandonment of Necessarianism, and the influence of Channing in clearing the way for the free agency and moral responsibility of man. The universe no longer lent itself to the interpretation which was the common property of the Calvinist and the Priestleyan, as turning on the perpetual antithesis of the Creator and the created, the Omnipotent and the impotent. The moral nature of man is recognised as the organ which raises him in the scale of being into union with God in so far as conscience reflects his judgments and humanity gives back the image of his holiness. The stress of life is now laid upon the consecration of the free will to the solemnity of righteousness and the majesty of duty. Christ becomes the Moral Ideal, and his temporal relations and delegated functions drop away in view of this universal application. It is impossible not to see that here again Martineau's line of inference is from man to Christ. Before he has settled precisely where or what Christ was in Scripture, the finality of Scripture has passed away never again to be rehabilitated. This I take to be the meaning of a passage in the preface to the second series of the "Endeavours" (1847), in which he warns his readers with the utmost candour that they must not refer all changes of view which may strike them to reconsideration of Scriptural arguments. "Controversies apparently historical cannot be settled by appeal to history alone. The Psychology of Religion must have precedence of its documentary criticism. . . . I am not ashamed to confess that extensive and, in the end, systematic changes in the opinions I derived from sect and education have had no higher origin than self-examination and reflection." The greatness of human capacity, on one side, the Divine idea once purely realised in a perfect and transcendent outward revelation, on the other—these are the points about which Martineau's thought turns in the early forties. God's answer in Christ to human needs, the moral aspiration of man finding a beauty of holiness as fixed before its gaze as the starry heavens, these are the essential things; and all the rest is subordinate. I think I am not mistaken in selecting Martineau's review of Theodore Parker's "Discourse of Religion" (1846) as the brilliant starting point of the man as we knew him. Whether the robust faith of the Boston preacher woke in Martineau a new confidence, or whether a long and thoughtful process had prepared the welcome accorded to Parker, I know not. But certain it is the criteria appealed to are other, the language is larger, the outlook more keen and joyous than in the preceding writings of this period. The whole system of the traditional evidences of Christianity has passed away, though he still believes that the resurrection of Christ is an "impregnable stronghold." The moral element must authenticate the miraculous, not vice versâ, and belief in the miracles of the New Testament is left an open question. The appeal to "that which may be known of God, and from the creation of the world is clearly seen" is fresh and fearless.

The language of the Moral Ideal is found throughout Martineau's later writings. We meet everywhere with abbreviated forms of the statement thus explicitly made in 1875:—"It has been said religion is moral idealism. Yes; but with an eye upon an ideal which has been humanly realised on earth, and for ever constitutes a divine perfection in heaven." The space between the abandonment of Necessarian doctrine of the old sort and the call to meet it in its new forms of Physical fatalism, Scientific materialism, and Human automatism, saw Martineau launched upon laborious investigation of the history of Christian and pre-Christian doctrines. He specially mentions his congregational teaching as having led him to find "the records which are the vehicle of Christianity less perfect than he had supposed, and the elements of Hellenistic theory and of Jewish misconception larger than he had thought" (1848). And further, he was laying the foundation of a religious philosophy in which at this time the teachings of Kant, of Coleridge, and of Maurice began to play prominent parts. It was, I think, largely to these influences that the next step was due,* and it was inevitable. To regard Christ as Moral Ideal may be to relapse, ethically, into Arianism. Conceive a being imposed as a pattern by God, which may be in the last resort only an economy for teaching us morals; made to set a copy for man, but perchance neither human or divine; which may shame you, but can wake no power in you—what joy have you in that realised perfection? This cannot be all. The person of Christ is not merely that of an historical individual inserted into humanity to furnish an example; he stands, says Martineau, for the living union of God with our humanity. It is our problem that is fought out under the guise of Christology. Man is not left to work out his moral destiny alone. In Christ we must see not a special nature simply receiving the Divine radiance and, like the lifeless moon, letting us have the cold reflection. There and here, the spirit of God and the spirit of man meet in interlacing lights and shades; and all that Jesus wins of the upper air and the fuller life, is inheritance and promise for us. In Martineau's words, "Through all our natural life, individual and social, is the Supernatural interfused, and the ideal colours of Heaven are spread through the substance of our experience to transfigure it. In us, however, there is ever a strife between the two. In Christ alone is the reconciliation perfect between the human and the Divine. But the same two natures meet in us all; and he is but the exemplar of a perpetual incarnation, of a living and constant union of God with our humanity." Again, "The headship of Christ is membership for us; flood-tide or neap, it is the same deep that flows." Returning from this point to Scripture, the whole question of revelation and inspiration subordinates itself to the thought that "the spirit of God which in the old time wrought their elements of sanctity into the pages of the Bible, lives and operates for ever in the human soul, renewing the light of Divine truth, and kindling eternal aspiration; so that the day of Pentecost is never past, and there is still a tongue of fire for every Evangelist."

But it was not in the nature of Martineau to leave anything in the realm of generalities. You know how much of the studies of his later years was closely critical. Long ago he had perceived that, to get at the real Jesus, we must not merely try to harmonise the Gospels, for in them the image has already passed into the doctrinal spectrum, and not always into the same part of it. In his last book "The Seat of Authority" he repeats in the final sections the image he had used years before of the unveiling of Jesus, the sweeping away of temporal investitures, in which he sees a process analogous to that which has brought physical science face to face with objective truth and freed it from a priori assumptions and hypotheses. It always seemed to him that, as the years went on, the true Jesus would more and more be found. In the spiritual world as in the physical he had no fear of science, but confidence that conscientious investigation can only reveal realities and sink deeper into the knowledge of the truth, while sympathy in the permanent facts of spiritual experience will truly interpret the past, and lay sure foundations for the future. Let us, who stand at the close of a century, listen to his aspiration for the century to come:—

"For myself I indulge a joyful hope that the next century of Christendom will be nobler than the last; that the great faiths which have struggled separately into the light of the one, will flow together on the broader and less broken surface of the other. If, however, this is to be, it will arise from no mere intellectual scrutiny, whose function will ever be to distinguish and not to unite, and in proportion as it dominates alone, to trace ever new lines of critical i vergency. Depend upon it, Unity lies in profounder strata of our nature than any tillage of mere intellect can reach. Sink deeply into the inmost life of any Christian faith and you will touch the ground of all. Let believers only be true to the grace they have, and more will be given; and enter where they may, the many-gated sanctuary of the Christian life, they will tend ever inwards to the same centre, and meet at last in the holiest of all" (1856).

* I am inclined to add (from conjecture, not from direct evidence), the influence of Hegel—and, with confidence, that of Martineau's own ardent love, and illuminating interpretation, of the writings of St. Paul.

Social Purity Alliance.—This Alliance, which was founded in 1873, held its annual meeting on June 8 at Westminster Town Hall, S.W., when it was addressed by a group of speakers representing contrasts in schools of thought, but all agreeing in the Alliance's fundamental doctrine of one moral code for both sexes. The Chairman (John Dendy, Esq., of Manchester) dealt with the topic of Social Purity with a legal mind, and especially brought out the necessity of educating the young, the first step towards which must be the education of the parents and teachers, in whose care the young are. He made a distinct protest against the popular plea that Social Impurity is inevitable, which doctrine he held to be a denial of a God. Dr. Josiah Oldfield followed with a medical view of Social Purity, while the social and religious aspects of the subject were spoken of by the Rev. Father Hopkins, the Rev. C. J. Street (Bolton), the Rev. J. C. Street (Shrewsbury), Mrs. Despard, and others. The report of the work of the Alliance concludes with an appeal for funds thus:—

The Alliance has lived and wrought since 1873. To enter upon a new century only partly equipped for the fray; to begin its twenty-eighth year in a lame and halting fashion, were deserving of reproach. While work remains to be done—and it does so remain; while young men of all sorts and conditions write thanking the Alliance for saving them from life-long regret, and while others write for help and information, we have every reason to go on in God's name and fight the good fight of Purity, and an equal moral standard for both sexes, undaunted and unafraid.

We, the first in the field, cannot brook the thought of turning back upon our purpose. The matter is in your hands. Without the means of work, work cannot be done.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me space to correct an error which I inadvertently fell into when speaking in London last week?

I am informed that it was the late Mr. Timothy Jevons who initiated this Association and started the first subscription list.

Its first work was the formation of a congregation at Crewe, where Mr. Jevons laid the foundation-stone of the chapel building in the year 1864.

SUMMER SESSION FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Sir,—I shall be glad if you will allow me space to remind Sunday-school teachers who may desire to take part in the Oxford School that their applications should be sent in to me at once, reaching me not later than Friday, the 22nd inst.

The detailed programme of proceedings will be ready in a few days, and copies will be sent to all members. The programme includes a course of lectures on The Bible in the Nineteenth Century, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, a series of addresses on the practical side of our work, how and what to teach, meetings of teachers in council, and visits to places of interest planned by our Oxford friends.

It is hoped that all schools which can, will send delegates to Oxford, and that a large and representative gathering of students will be present at the opening service and address by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, President of the Sunday-school Association, on Friday morning, July 6.

WANTED! A PIANO!

Sir,—Your readers will be interested to know that we are opening the Holiday Home of the Manchester Sunday School Association on Saturday next, June 23. You were good enough to publish recently a short account of the Home and of the way in which it serves to provide holidays for our own teachers and children. In concluding my former letter I ventured to appeal to your readers for help in the furnishing of the Home. I pointed out that with our limited means we were compelled to keep ourselves to bare necessaries, but that there were a few simple luxuries which we wanted very much. For instance, we want a second-hand cottage piano. We open and close our days with hymn and prayer, and, when the weather is unkind, we beguile the hours with hymn and song. In all this a piano would be of immense service, and so it was that I ventured to ask the aid of your readers in securing one. In reply I have received, not a piano, but a subscription towards the purchase of one. If a few other friends would send me equally kind subscriptions I could get the piano in time for it to grace our opening proceedings. I also asked for any spare carpets or curtains which your readers might have on their hands. In response I have received several kind gifts, but not yet quite sufficient for our purpose. May I therefore ask a second kindly consideration also of this part of my appeal. Any contribution, however small, will be most gratefully accepted. Charles Peach.

THE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION AND FREE CHURCHES.

Sir,—Some sympathy was expressed at the annual Conference of the Unitarian Association with the suggestion thrown out by Mr. Sunderland that the Association should assume a representative function and character as regards our Unitarian congregations. May I remind your readers that this whole question was fought out, under Dr. Martineau's leadership, thirty-four years ago? A meeting had been held, on March 14, 1866, at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, of which I was then the minister, at which the relation of the Association to our non-subscribing congregations was fully and carefully discussed, and it was resolved to move at the ensuing meeting of the Unitarian Association to rescind the rule for congregational representation. It was further resolved, on the motion of the Rev. Charles Beard, seconded by the Rev. John James Tayler—

That it is advisable to hold a general meeting of members and ministers of the Liberal Christian congregations of Great Britain and other persons likely to be interested in the object of the meeting, to consider the desirableness of forming a comprehensive association for objects of common religious concern among them, and that such meeting be convened in London for the day succeeding the meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

A committee was appointed, consisting of Dr. Martineau, the Rev. J. J. Tayler, the Rev. John Gordon, the Rev. Charles Beard, Mr. William Enfield, Mr. Joseph Lupton, Mr. W. J. Lamport, and Mr. W. Strickland Cookson, with Mr. Edward Enfield and myself as secretaries, to carry out these resolutions. The resolution to rescind the rule for congregational representation was sent in at once, bearing thirty-nine signatures, the influential character of which you will recognise in glancing them over in the circular I enclose herewith. Of those thirty-nine men I think Dr. Brooke Herford, Mr. A. W. Worthington, and I are the only survivors. Thus supported, our motion was carried, and the Association ceased to represent congregations.

The carrying out of our second resolution followed from the success of the first, and occupied us just a year. Of the committee which took it in hand by the appointment of the Nottingham Conference, I am the sole survivor. On June 14, 1867, we held a conference at University Hall, Mr. Strickland Cookson in the chair, at which Dr. Martineau moved, and Mr. Herbert New seconded, the following resolution:—

That whereas the Christian Religion, in its essential influence, is not contingent upon right opinion on matters of history, criticism or metaphysics, and in its application to life has become encumbered with a load of superfluous conditions, it is incumbent on those who find its essence in the two great affections of Love to God and Love to Man, to unite their scattered forces, both for closer communion in work and worship, and for resisting every intrusive interference with the intellect and conscience of men.

The meeting formed a committee by whom the scheme of the Free Christian Union was elaborated on the basis of Dr. Martineau's outline. This work took another year, and we held the first general meeting on June 26, 1868. The Union was dissolved in December, 1870.

I have never had any doubt that the causes of our failure were not in the scheme, but in its working. It was not that the appeal to Liberal Christian congregations failed, for it was never fully made, but that the "other persons likely to be interested" could not work with such congregations. Some of our leading men were not Nonconformists, and the Free Christian Union was either a Nonconforming body, or it was nothing. It was not allowed to be frankly Nonconformist, so it came to nothing. But I cannot help thinking that there is still room for the embodiment of Dr. Martineau's idea in an institution which should unite our congregations and represent to the world their absolute and uncompromising Dissent from every Church which makes Christianity consist in the holding of a creed.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Toplady and the "Rock of Ages."

Do any of the readers of the "Children's Column" know a hymn beginning with the words "Rock of Ages"? They will be sure some day to meet with it. It may not be one of the best hymns, but it is one of the hymns most widely known and most dearly loved. When, some years ago, the Editors of the Sunday at Home asked their readers to send in a list of their favourite hymns, "Rock of Ages" stood first on the list. Out of 3,500 who sent in, over 3,200 chose that hymn as one.

And they did not choose badly. The hymn is not in the "Essex Hall Hymnal," or, I suppose, in any of the hymn-books used by congregations named in the "Essex Hall Year Book." For you and me the hymn requires to be translated into more modern phrases. But its meaning is something like this: "I cannot put myself forward as a good man or a saint; I feel that I would like to hide behind one who is greater and better than I. I would not reckon up my own works, or count upon my earnestness; rather as long as I live and in the hour of death I would trust in the goodness of God for forgiveness and help and blessing. He is the Rock of Salvation, I am a weak and sinful man." Something like that the hymn expresses. It came out of the heart of a sincere and good man, and it has found a response in the hearts of other men.

And now just a few words about the writer. His name was Augustus Montague Toplady. He was born at Farnham in the year 1740, was educated at Westminster and then at Trinity College, Dublin, and became a clergyman of the Church of England. He died in 1778, his career as a clergyman was therefore short, lasting but fourteen years; for ten years of that time he was vicar of a country church in Devon, at a little place called Broad Hembury. In that church there is at present a beautiful tablet in memory of the former vicar; it contains one of his favourite texts of scripture, and the first verse of his hymn "Rock of Ages." I felt it necessary to begin with some little account of the man Toplady, but it will be more interesting to you to learn something about him as a boy. And it will delight you to know that though a good boy he was not a model boy cut out of a certain kind of Sunday-school book; but a boy really alive. He kept a diary in which he set down his own adventures and works and opinions, and from it I will make a few extracts.

In 1751 (when he was eleven) he put down: "On Shrove Tuesday I wrote a sermon; I have three more of my own composition."

1752.—Feb. 23: "... I always love God, and endeavour to cast away all impurity and sin whatever. When I was a very little boy, I found a pocket-book with clasps, purse, and hinges of solid silver."

April 7: "My aunt Betsy invented a terrible mistake of me. I have a little garden at Mr. Bunting's; she said she sowed some horse-radish in it; that I had pulled it up. In a fortnight I saw a great head (which I took then to be flowers) of horse-radish. I told her of the mistake ... on which she multiplied her number from one piece of radish to two; stands in it, and that I told a lie; but thanks be to God I scorn one. God forgive her! for I do."

He used to say nice little prayers on his way to school; very sensible reasonable prayers they were, but I have not space to copy them. But he writes in his diary:

I always join in the prayers which are said in the school, and though I do not understand the prayers yet, I join in the Lord's Prayer.

He also tells us the rules he laid down for his own good conduct. On May 15 he praises God that though he was eleven years old last November, he can remember no dreadful crime!

On May 16 he sets down his troubles as follows:—

I went to my Uncle Jack's; he never asked me to sit down (very rude). When I first came in he set an ill look, and made me repeat my message several times over, which was, "Sir, mamma presents her service to you, and hopes you are well." He, having set a very rude look, asked me "Why did you not come on Sunday?" I told him that I dah ton sehtolc tif ot emo tuo fo a yadnuS. (When little Toplady was shy of setting down words plainly he spelt the words backwards as in the last sentence). ... He never asked me to sit down, but sent my mamma owt saeniug, and my aunt owt more; she gave me a shilling.

Further entries tell how he went to Aunt Betsy's, and she called him abusive names, "&c., &c., &c." There should have been a lot of wrong language to justify all those etceteras; probably Betsy had invented another mistake about him. That, in any case, is what his Uncle Jack did, for when young Toplady was showing off his original sermons his uncle shook his head and said "he knew what children can do before now." His uncle asked him who he'd got them out of, and when the boy said they were his own he said, "You cannot persuade me beyond my senses; you have taken them out of Bishop Andrews." He told little Toplady not to make it worse by denying it. It was of no use to insist, and the boy had to bear the accusation. Some months later he went to his uncle's, and was not even admitted, on which he wrote in his diary:—"Pray God look upon it. Amen! I have done no more harm to him than a child unborn. I thank God I am conscious that I have not done anything to him, nor do I know to what cause to attribute his un-uncly behaviour." Probably, on the one hand, his uncle was unreasonable; but little Toplady may also have offended his uncle by showing off. He had a fair share of conceit. He wrote some verses which he considered a hymn, and added in his diary: "I made but two scratchings in it, and it came all flop into my head without studying." In truth, however, the verses look laboured, as if the result of some trying. Perhaps the curious diary, written when the preacher was a schoolboy, may throw light on the hymn he wrote when a man. For we may be sure that all through life, as when a child, he would be conscientious and true, and yet would have to put up with people's invented mistakes and un-uncly behaviour; and then, tempted to be proud of his own innocence as well as of his talents, he would feel the need to force himself into the background, and would pray, in the words of the hymn which I have often heard sung loudly as if it were a song of victory,

> Rock of Ages, cleft for me
> Let me hide myself in thee.

ACCOUNTS received from Auckland (New Zealand) continue to be of a most satisfactory character as regards the newly-formed congregation, of which the Rev. W. Jellie has charge. A lady who is on her way to England from the colony writes: "The Church is making good progress; we have large congregations every Sunday evening. Mr. Jellie is universally liked, and seems to be pre-eminently the right man in the right place." We hope the movement, so well begun, may have uninterrupted success.

FROM the latest issue of the "Messiah Pulpit" (New York), we learn with regret that the health of the Rev. Dr. M. J. Savage, which has been feeble for a year or more, renders a suspension of work desirable till after the vacation. Dr. Savage will take a short trip abroad in the meantime. From our own shores the Rev. R. A. Armstrong set sail on Tuesday, this week, for a trip to Quebec and St. Lawrence. No doubt his sermon preached on Trinity Sunday morning, and published in our columns this week, will attract much attention, the more so as it deals with the suggestions of the Rev. C. E. Beeby, on the subject of the Trinity. Correspondents will note that Mr. Armstrong will be away till about the middle of July, and therefore cannot reply to any criticisms before that date.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

THERE is no sane person in the kingdom who does not deplore the evils caused by drunkenness. That is not the same thing as to say that all sane persons are united in the effort to lessen these evils. If such a unity existed many reforms, such as those unanimously agreed upon by Lord PEEL'S Commission, would be very soon enacted. Better than enacted, they would very soon be on the way to universal practice. Unhappily there are still many good-meaning and respectable people who have never yet taken any active steps in support of temperance reform. They have probably looked upon the subject as one of the large group of more-or-less important matters out of which no man can do more than select a few for special study and co-operation. The fact is that there is no social reform at once so urgently needed and so vast as that concerned with intemperance. We need not labour this point. The change that has come over public opinion in the period between the first great Temperance Congress in London in 1846, and that which has met here this week, is enormous, and is most encouraging. Then it was generally believed that some amount of intoxicating beverage was necessary to maintain health and strength. More than half-a-century's experience in the Army and Navy, in life assurance offices, in general medical practice, and in personal history, has shown the entire fallacy of such an opinion. It was not uncommon in those days to ridicule abstainers as fools, when they were not to be denounced as hypocrites. The pioneers of the modern temperance movement have lived to see it no longer despised and scoffed at. Its enemies, the men whose interests are at stake, do it the homage of rallying all their forces to defeat its aims. They know that the testimony of all observers that drunkenness is the most fruitful source of business loss, ill-health, family discord, social disorder, and national waste grows more positive every year. Their own representatives on the Commission just mentioned were no less convinced than the other members as to the necessity of mitigating these terrible evils. That nothing much at present seems likely to come of even their recommendations will be a source of regret to many people of all shades of political and religious opinion.

It is not, we are sure, only the teetotaller who is sincerely anxious for a better state of things. It is, however, chiefly the teetotaller who is left to do the work of reform. The "moderate" man hates the vice of drunkenness. He is ashamed of the wretched tale told every morning in our police-courts; he shudders at the appalling revelations of crimes due to nothing but the maddening drink. He is certainly not less affected by the cost to the nation of this wide-spread vice. If he knew how, he would, we believe, willingly abate the evil. But how? The training of the young people in Bands of Hope and Temperance Societies is a work that he discriminately approves. It has its weak side, and he knows it; but if by its means the rising race could be really fortified against temptation, through habits early ingrained and knowledge intelligently appreciated, the "moderate" man would be unfeignedly glad. But he has his doubts as to methods and results; besides it is usual to expect workers in these societies to be abstainers out-and-out. What is he to do?

Well, far be it from us to dictate his course—may we suggest one of several? There is no doubt that the policy of Governments in these days is continually shaping itself, not in accord with "the judgment of the wisest man," but in accord with the supposed wishes of the greatest number of voters. Let it be so, then; and why should not the multitude of sane, sobriety-loving citizens, who are not "extremists" in this matter, at least take some pains to let legislators know that they want the evils of intemperance to be assuaged as effectually as possible—if not in one way then in another, but at any rate in some way? Why should not every decent man who likes his glass of beer or wine, but who loathes excess, write to his member or to the leader of his party urging the utmost attention to every Bill that comes before Parliament with the aim of temperance reform? Why not protest against the shelving of the reforms approved by the trade representatives themselves? Why should not every such man take some part—definite, if humble—in controlling the public-houses, either through a clear manifestation of public opinion,—by organised societies if possible—against the misconduct which still goes on despite the statutes, or by pressure on the licensing authorities, so that they may be emboldened to limit the chances of excess or frightened from extending them?

There is no intended irony in these suggestions. There has been too much assumption, we are told, that the cause of temperance is the same as that of total abstinence. For our part we are perfectly willing to admit the force of the criticism. But this evil of intemperance is not one to be trifled with. Our own duty is not done when we have scored in argument over some one who is trying to do his duty. The greatest of reforms needs the greatest unanimity of forces. If moderate drinkers, who still form the large majority of the population, will only do something, whatever share they like, or can, but a real share, in ridding the nation of this abominable curse, they will be good citizens; but not unless. At present a few of them are working in this cause. They are teaching, refining, amusing, reproving, encouraging, by turns—all with a view to help some weaker brother to avoid the power of drink. Good; but what are they among so many? If the proportion of such workers is not to increase rapidly, the "moderates" will be doomed still to hear the reproaches cast upon them, and often most justly, by those who, whether they are "fanatics" or not, are at least toiling as best they know how in this longest and hardest of campaigns.

THE PULPIT.

A SERMON FOR TRINITY SUNDAY.*

BY THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

"Neither do men put new wine into old wine-skins: else the skins burst, and the wine is spilled, and the skins perish: but they put new wine into fresh wine-skins, and both are preserved."—Matthew ix. 17, R.V.

THIS is one of those thirteen days in the ecclesiastical year on which every Anglican clergyman must do one or other of these two things. He must either denounce the everlasting curse of God on all men who do not hold in its most extreme and uncompromising form the doctrine of the Trinity, or else he must break his solemn ordination vows and the law of the land. For this is Trinity Sunday, and on Trinity Sunday it is ordained in the Church of England that the so-called Creed of St. Athanasius shall be said or sung at morning prayer by the minister and the people standing.

But if such ordinance was made in an age when the spirit of the time was for emphasising and accentuating to the utmost all theological differences, we ourselves have fallen upon an age when thousands of kindly and amiable souls are for minimising all such differences, and making out that our divergencies are for the most part mere matters of words, and that we are all substantially agreed.

An interesting and instructive example of this kindlier temper is displayed in two articles, which many of you must have noticed in recent numbers of THE INQUIRER, from the pen of the Rev. C. E. Beeby, rector of Yardley Wood. This benevolent clergyman sets himself to show that between the true Trinitarian and the true Unitarian there is little difference save difference of language, and that a Unitarian may, therefore, be recognised as a religious Christian man, a brother and ally in Christ.

Now in every fresh expression of tolerance and fraternity we do well to take pleasure. And we may well be glad that Mr. Beeby is of so conciliatory a theological temper. Yet I think that we Unitarians have been so accustomed to be spoken of as pariahs or spiritual lepers that we sometimes congratulate ourselves a little too much when some good orthodox brother shows himself willing to treat us with common decency. After all, a Trinitarian may be just as well congratulated on being almost as good as a Unitarian, as a Unitarian congratulated on being almost as good as a Trinitarian. And I like the anecdote of the famous Unitarian minister in Boston, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, who, being introduced to a very high and dry Anglican clergyman recently imported from this country, and who held Unitarians in a fine sacerdotal scorn, heartily shook him by the hand, saying, "I'm glad to know you, sir, and welcome you to Boston. We're mostly Unitarians here, but you'll find us quite ready to treat you just as one of ourselves."

With this passing protest against pluming ourselves too much because an orthodox man speaks civilly of us, let us proceed to glance at the substance of Mr. Beeby's articles.

Mr. Beeby begins by declaring that many a Unitarian is nearer to orthodox belief than some professors of orthodoxy. This is said in a kindly and generous spirit; but for my part I deem it beside the point. The question is, are we nearer to a true belief? For orthodox belief—if by orthodox is meant that which has been officially sanctioned by ecclesiastics and Councils—is in all probability false belief. And it is at best indifferent whether the Unitarian is or is not orthodox in his interpretation of religion. It is the minority, the earnest, independent thinkers, that penetrate nearest to the truth of God; and the highest attainable realisation of divine truth in the human mind lies far away in the untrodden future, not in the pronouncements of the prelates and scholastics of the past.

Mr. Beeby proceeds to distinguish the Trinity as conceived by the subtle and metaphysical minds of the Greek fathers from its presentation by the far ruder intellect of Rome; and he exposes the absurdity of trying to get a theology straight out of the New Testament, seeing that the earlier Gospels teach one doctrine of Christ, the Epistles of Paul another, and the Gospel according to St. John a third; the doctrine of the Trinity not arriving at its full development till long after the last word of the New Testament had been written.

And then comes the great question—the insoluble puzzle, as one well might say—what the word "Person" means in the full-fledged Trinitarian doctrine. A large part of Western Christianity has gone wrong from supposing the word to mean what it means in our ordinary speech, a separate individual, a being with distinct mind and will of his own. On this colossal and fundamental error are built up the monstrous notions of a divine "Society" of Persons within the Godhead, of transactions between one "Person" and another, of Christ offering himself to appease the wrath of the Father, which Mr. Beeby sweeps aside as unorthodox. And Mr. Beeby settles down on Cardinal Newman's dictum that "Person" in this connection means something "more than a mere character, yet less than an individual intelligent being."

Next comes the contention which lies at the heart of all modern apologies for the Trinitarian doctrine—though, in fact, it abolishes everything which the Roman and the Anglican and the great Nonconformist bodies have always understood by the Trinity—that the three Persons are simply aspects, modes, phases of the One indivisible God. And our essayist quotes one paragraph from Canon Wilberforce, with which, metaphysical and abstruse as it may seem, I fear I must load this sermon. "The threefold plurality in the inner nature of the Universal Soul," says Canon Wilberforce, "is now recognised by every reverent thinker as being not three distinct wills, consciences, intellects, but as one Elemental Substance following the universal law of Being, Manifestation, and Outflowing Influence. The names Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are a mode of expressing the intense nearness that the all-inclusive Spirit of Love claims with every department, every need, every mental attitude, of the life of man. In their deepest meaning they signify Love in essential being, Love in manifestation, Love in eternal procession."

To this quotation Mr. Beeby adds the comment that "there are few modern Unitarians who will refuse to receive the doctrine of the Trinity thus relieved of popular misinterpretations."

As a Unitarian who utterly refuses the doctrine even in this ingenious form, I desire to make my position clear.

In the Creed of the Church, says Mr. Beeby, following indeed no less a guide than Dr. Martineau, "the only attribute which distinguishes the First Person is that of Maker of all things"—and even so, the Father is only the Maker or Creator in intention, the actual making or creating being entirely the work of the Son. And the doctrine of the Trinity is, according to theologians of Mr. Beeby's school, simply an excellent contrivance to teach us to think of God first as absolutely withdrawn from all manifestation or activity, in that aspect called "the Father"; secondly, as active in creation and all the phenomena of nature, in that aspect called the Son, and thirdly, as entering into communion with the human spirit and leading and guiding the inner life of men, in that aspect called the Holy Ghost.

And then Mr. Beeby goes on to cite to his support at considerable length a celebrated sermon or essay of Dr. Martineau's, the publication of which I frankly confess I have always deeply regretted—not because it is not in its main contention true, but because inferences are drawn from it which seem to me singularly misleading and unfortunate. In that essay Dr. Martineau reminds us how in Trinitarian Christianity the Father is conceived as never manifesting himself, never entering into action, the deep and silent Abyss of ultimate being, while in Unitarian Christianity the word Father is used to express the fullest intensity of love and parental communion with the human soul. But in Trinitarian Christianity, this Object of intense love and devotion, this aspect of God in his tender care and close communion with man is expressed by the word Son—so that what the Son is to the Trinitarian, the Father is to the Unitarian, and what the Father is to the Unitarian, the Son is to the Trinitarian; so that, further, their difference is largely a mere difference of words and terms, and both Trinitarian and Unitarian have a God to worship who is in closest moral and spiritual relation to them and supples all the needs of religious life, only that they call this God by different names.

And adopting all this from Dr. Martineau, Mr. Beeby feels that he has brought the devout Unitarian to practical acquiescence in the Trinitarian profession. "Unitarianism," he declares, "exists to uphold the doctrine of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, as one God, and so far, Unitarianism must be welcomed by all true orthodox believers."

Such is Mr. Beeby's peace-offering, his proffered eirenicon, generously conceived and courageously presented. Let us acknowledge the ingenuity of his argument and the excellence of his motive. But having done that much, I for one must utterly and absolutely refuse to subscribe to the terms of the alliance.

There are those in our own immediate fellowship who scornfully speak of the controversy between Trinitarian and Unitarian Christianity as an old-world disputation which has lost all interest and moment. I am unable to concur in such a judgment; and on this Trinity Sunday, when the Anglican Church is banded together to denounce us, I would with all the clearness and emphasis at my command state why I deem that a Unitarian capitulation on the terms here offered would be a betrayal of the cause of Christian truth, and of loyal discipleship to Jesus Christ.

I think my main objections may be gathered up under three several heads:—

1.—In the first place, the distinction in God of these several Persons, even if by Person you only mean "something more than character but less than individual" is, to my thinking, arbitrary and artificial. As expounded in these modern Broad Church expositions it is a mere attempt to pour the new wine of present-day religion into the old wine-skins of the Trinitarian formula. One man tells us that the three Persons signify "Love in essential being, love in manifestation, love in eternal procession." Another explains that the first Person is God apart from any attribute that brings Him into touch with us; that the second is God producing the natural world, and the third God working in the spirit of man. Each man has his own three-fold cord to fit the formulary. And it is evident that there is no difficulty about conceiving God in three different aspects, if that is to be called Trinitarianism. Only it would be just as easy to conceive Him in two or four or seven or nine, if that were the traditional number handed down by the creed-makers. Such classifications can readily be made to order to suit any confession and to fit any article of faith. But they are arbitrary and artificial, and have no food in them for the religious life.

II.—And this leads me to my second and far graver objection to the eirenicon proposed—namely, that all such ingenuities draw the mind away from essential religious life. Religion is not a matter of balancing ones and threes; it is a matter of the touch of the human soul with the living God. However correct may be Mr. Beeby's account of the inner economy of Deity, we can none of us possibly tell that it is correct; and it is as irrelevant to lead the worshipper off on these curious speculations, as it would be to invite the attention of a man who is stirred by the kindling word of some fiery prophet to the fact that there is the enduring Ego of the prophet at the foundation of his preaching, the action of emotion upon brain in the next place, and the propulsion given to the air by the various movements of the tongue in the third. In the flood-tide of a great emotion we do not want a lecture on anatomy; in the life of the human soul with God we do not want metaphysical distinctions between different aspects, or characters, or "subsistencies," or phases, or "personæ," or persons of the One Living and Supreme Father and Creator of us all.

Moreover, for one person who can follow such discussions with any sort of intelligence, there are a hundred who, if they try to assimilate the creed, will infallibly be plunged into that very Tritheism, that hazy belief in three several Gods, which Mr. Beeby would almost shut out from the very name and title of Christian. So that the whole Trinitarian contention tends and must ever tend to plunge the Church back into the polytheistic slough.

III.—But most emphatically of all do I dissent from the position in which we are invited to find reconciliation with Trinitarian thought because I cannot think other than that it rejects and destroys that pre-eminent teaching of Jesus Christ, which to my mind constitutes the very heart and essence not only of the religion of Jesus, but of the purest, truest, and most beautiful religion to which the human spirit has ever yet attained.

For this so-called orthodoxy squanders the exquisite thought of the Fatherhood of God—the central inspiration of Jesus of Nazareth—and abandons the great symbol which he made luminous, in order to appropriate the term "Father" to the remote and inaccessible element of God, of which man can know nothing, with which he never comes into contact, with which he can hold no possible communion. The whole energy and strength of his being Jesus spent in striving to lead men to realise that God is a Father to us in the very nearest and dearest, most living and vital essence of that relationship. It was to a Father he strove to draw our love; in a Father he bade us put our trust, a Father that he taught us cared for us with an infinite tenderness; to a Father that he bade us bring our secret prayer, our confessing of sin, the overflowing of our grateful hearts. And in the name of this very Christ who taught us that, men bid us put aside this glorious symbol, conceive of the Father as a remote, inaccessible mode of God, drop the filial relation utterly out of our religious conception, and be content with the Son of the Father as the object of our deepest spiritual life. Dr. Martineau generously strives to show that the difference is mainly one of words. I think it goes infinitely deeper than that: for they who refuse to receive from Jesus his beautiful teaching concerning the Father, and relegate the name he chose for the expression of the tenderness and nearness of God to stand for his inaccessible remoteness, betray the fact that they have never really grasped the faith which Jesus gave himself with so absolute a devotion to impress upon the human soul.

And so I confess that I am altogether bewildered and confounded when I find Mr. Beeby writing these extraordinary words: "Where Christ," says he, "is followed as a teacher, and God is worshipped, though the Fatherhood of God be exalted as a theological doctrine, the Fatherhood will lack the depth and intensity which it has in the doctrine of the Trinity, where humanity is fully recognised by making Christ one with God." Can that really be deliberately said by a Christian minister? I find it hard to believe that it is not some printer's error, some sport of a malicious compositor. If we follow Christ as a teacher, the Fatherhood of God will lack intensity and depth? O, Sir, have you ever read the Gospels? Have you ever thrilled to the accents in which Jesus speaks of our Heavenly Father? Which of the authors of the Trinitarian Confession felt the Fatherhood of God as Jesus felt it? Which of them quickens in the human heart the sense of that Divine Fatherhood embracing and sustaining us as he has quickened it? Do the subtle metaphysics of an Athanasius penetrate the soul more deeply than the simple trust and love breathed from Jesus' lips? Yet you tell us that if we follow this Jesus as a Teacher, we cannot know the Fatherhood in its spiritual riches; for that we must go to the makers of the complex and bewildering Creed!

Not "as a theological doctrine" in any dogmatic sense would we "exalt the Fatherhood of God;" but as the central, fundamental, deepest, sublimest, most blessed and most beautiful fact of the religious life, to us even as it was to him, the Master. For therein we have the essence of light, and life, and love.

And, thank God! there is after all a happy inconsistency in many a subtle theologian; and the very men who teach that God the Father is remote, inaccessible, aloof, the first Person of a mysterious Trinity in which we have to do only with the second and the third, yet turn again and again from the complexities of their own strange Creed, and kneel like Jesus in the presence of the Father, pour out to Him the cry of children feeling for His love, and cling to Him with that perfect trust with which Jesus trusted Him in the hour of utmost agony and dread.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

The twelfth annual meeting of this society was held at Essex Hall on Thursday afternoon, June 7, the President, Miss Tagart, in the chair.

Miss Florence Hill (hon. sec.) read extracts from the report.

The report opened with the following sentences:—

Those of us engaged in religious work during 1899 must have felt peculiar difficulties under the shadow of this great national calamity—War. How small our work! how great the needs of the time! And yet it is in times like these that Postal Mission workers ought to be most active, for are we not, above all things, witnessing to the wisdom and love of one Supreme Father of the whole human race! and are not the written words sent out, silent messengers, appealing to reason and conscience, through which true victory, the moral victory can alone be won—as opposed to blind brute force? And are we not thereby helping on, however humbly, however slowly, the coming of the Kingdom of the Prince of Peace? Those who want speedy or brilliant results should not engage in Postal Mission work, it is literally a sowing beside all waters, and in all soils, and must in its very nature be unseen; but now and again, often after years of waiting there is evidence of such a rich harvest, that the sowers are amply blest. May these words of encouragement reach our scattered and isolated fellow-workers and give them heart for fresh effort in the coming year.

Having referred to the proceedings at the previous annual meeting, the report further noted that during the year three new Postal missions had been affiliated, those of Swansea and Melbourne and the McQuaker Postal Mission in Scotland, conducted by the Rev. A. E. Parry. The removal of Mr. and Mrs. Julian Winser from Malvern had brought their Postal Mission work there to an end. At Portsmouth a Young People's Religious Union had been founded, and one indirect result of the Hope-street Women's Congregational Union at Liverpool had been the formation of a small but increasing Sunday-school at Garston. Particulars were given of the faithful work carried on at Framlingham and Bedfield, under the ministry of the Rev. A. Amey, and of the re-opening of the Boston Chapel. A very satisfactory account was given of the work at Battle, where Miss Tagart, as reported last year, had converted the old chapel into a reading-room and institute. The religious conferences conducted on the first Sunday of each month by Miss Florence Hill and Mr. L. Tavener at College Chapel, Stepney, had proved very helpful.

Taking the work of all the affiliated Postal Missions together, it was reported that during the year there had been 1,697 new applicants for Unitarian literature, rather fewer than in the previous year, and that there were 1,276 old correspondents on the books; 1,440 theological books had been borrowed, 25 persons were known to have joined Unitarian congregations through the Postal Missions during the year. In conclusion, dealing with finance, the report showed that for the proper maintenance of the work an addition of £50 in annual subscriptions was required. Interesting reports from 25 affiliated societies were appended, and also a report of the very successful Grindelwald excursion of 1899.

Miss E. M. Lawrence, as treasurer, presented the accounts, which showed that the total receipts for the General Fund and the Suffolk Village Mission had been £256 0s. 8d., rather more than in the previous year. That amount included a grant of £50 from the B. and F.U.A. But there had been heavy extra expenses for the re-building of an organ at Framlingham, the purchase of an harmonium and the erection of a new fence at Bedfield. The reserve fund of £30 17s. 7d. had, therefore, been used, and the remaining deficit of £25 had been paid by the guarantors.

The balance-sheet of the Grindelwald excursion showed an expenditure of £1,034 7s. 6d., on which a deficiency of £6 3s. 8d. had been made good from the special reserve fund. One hundred and forty-six persons had joined in the excursion. Referring to the general work of the Mission, Miss Lawrence said she was sure that when it was clearly understood what was being done, the needed funds would be forthcoming, and she confidently asked for the further £50 a year they required.

The PRESIDENT, at the opening of her address, mentioned a letter she had received from Lady Bowring, whose interest in their work was very warm, and then spoke of the loss they had sustained by the death of Miss Anna Swanwick, one of their vice-presidents—an unfailing and most helpful sympathiser with the Postal Mission. Dr. Martineau also had taken a warm interest in their work, and when from time to time they had sent letters of correspondents for him to see, had been grateful for such testimonies to the helpfulness of his writings, often from humble and illiterate people. Miss Tagart quoted from one or two letters to show the deep feeling of their correspondents for Dr. Martineau. "We continually turn to these pages for encouragement and inspiration." "Dr. Martineau is our saint, our inspirer"; and speaking of the need of a baptism of fire and of the Spirit, added that that was just what they found in Dr. Martineau's works. Those who came over from other bodies missed in their ministers and preachers the warmth of emotional expression, which, perhaps, was overdone among the orthodox. If that were attended to, they would meet the needs of converts more fully than at present.

Miss CLEPHAN moved the adoption of the report and accounts. The report, she said, began rather sadly with an aspiration and a sigh for fellowship, but ended with an expression of the beauty of fellowship already attained in the Grindelwald meetings. What was of special interest in such reports was that they laid bare the processes of free religious thought. They heard constantly of the broadening of Orthodox Churches, but a great deal of that appeared to her of a very superficial kind. Those who would no longer undertake any responsibility for the creeds under whose shadow they still remained, and would not undertake any responsibility for the freedom of thought to which they had come, would never be any real help to freedom. On the other hand, it was very satisfactory to see in their reports real education in religious thought going on. They must be glad to hear of 1,697 new correspondents and nearly 1,300 old ones remaining on the books, and twenty-five correspondents had openly come out, to bring their strength and fervour to the cause they had learnt to value and admire, a cause which they in their turn desired to help. This laid a great responsibility on those who were born into the faith. It was work which required a great deal of patience, but in it they might have a great deal of hope.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. F. SUMMERS and unanimously adopted.

On the motion of Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR, seconded by the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, the officers and Committee were elected, the mover mentioning that the only new name on the Committee was that of Mrs. Sunderland, whom they would heartily welcome.

A conference on "Women's Work in Christian Churches" was then introduced by Mrs. BROOKE HERFORD, who was present on the platform, but whose paper was read by Miss Herford. Having referred to her leaflet on "Women's Congregational Unions," published by the Central Postal Mission, Mrs. Herford first spoke of the development of the old "sewing society" into a more general society of women for united congregational work. The idea had first occurred to her at Strangeways twenty-five years ago, and it had been pleasant to hear from her old society that last year they had contributed £67 to the church funds. At Rosslyn Hill Chapel they had established a "Women's Congregational Union" six years ago, which recently stepped in on an emergency, and had been found so indispensable in the proper domestic ordering of the church that women had been for the first time elected on the church committee. The Union also aimed at helping in the work of their Domestic Missions, and one instance was given of the regular supply of delicacies for sick people among the poor, members sending in various contributions by arrangement, which are then forwarded in a weekly or fortnightly hamper to Mrs. Summers at George's Row Mission. The Union had also been interested in making the young people of the congregation better acquainted with each other, and to give them a more united interest in the chapel. They had been instrumental in founding a Social Union, which was left entirely to the management of the young people themselves, and incorporated a number of subsidiary clubs, so that it was now a strong society and of great service to the congregation. The Union did not confine itself to denominational affairs, and was ready to take part in public social work—co-operating with other churches. A similar Union started some four or five years ago, on her suggestion, by a small congregation in the West of England, had held regular monthly meetings, and had been found extremely helpful.

The Rev. MARION MURDOCH then gave an address on "Women's Work in America." Their faith, she said, like that of Jesus, had suffered strange misunderstanding, and their business was not so much to proselytise as to clarify, to make people understand the truth they held. It was remarkable to notice the number of questions asked of them, and that great desire for information from people of every kind had given rise to the Post Office Mission as a branch of their Unitarian work. The "Church-door Pulpit" had also been very useful, by which attenders at their services were able to take away literature with them. Miss Murdoch then described the work of the "Women's Auxiliary," and its growth into an independent "Women's Alliance," which had shown quite beyond expectation, the work women could do to strengthen the general work of the churches. The Alliance had not only greatly strengthened the Post Office Mission, raising large sums of money for that and other church work, but in many other ways was learning to set their church house in order, and to utilise the energies of people who were longing to help, but not knowing in what direction to lend a hand. No one had been more helpful in the work of the Alliance than Mrs. Brooke Herford while she was in America. They had two great purposes, to deepen religious life and to make their faith and principles better understood. They had a great ideal of universal religion, in which it was seen that with Jesus all souls were children of the living God, and they had inspired scriptures in Bible and in poets, which must be rightly interpreted to the people. To the spreading of those great truths they ought to consecrate themselves with a fervour as intense as the world had ever seen. She was thankful for the work in this country, which was more far-reaching than they might realise. The interchange of the writings of their inspiring teachers between England and America was a strength and encouraging to both. They must never despair, for they were saved by hope, and surely they could offer great hopes for great souls. Prophets always turned their faces to the dawn. They must be among the hopers and workers, doing their best to bring light and loveliness into religion.

The Rev. T. SHAKSPEARE having expressed his strong sympathy with the work, Miss SPENCER referred to the work of the John Pounds Training Home for Girls at Portsmouth, and said that their young people must be encouraged to come together for something more than amusements, that they might learn to do helpful work.

Miss FREEMAN CLARKE said that with the giving up of all sacerdotal authority and an official character in their ministry they must take care that both men and women were drawn into the work of the churches, to become assistant pastors to the minister. They must supplement the giving up of authority by voluntary work. Their emphasis should always bear the things of belief, not of disbelief; above all, they must remember that love opens the door of truth. A young and zealous minister was sometimes too ready to say supercilious and contemptuous things about orthodox beliefs, and so repelled those who were being drawn into sympathy with boarder views of truth. Their part should be to bring forward the gospel not only of truth, but of love.

Mrs. WRIGHT, of the Liverpool Postal Mission, spoke of their special work among doctors and in Ireland, where it was lamentable to find how utterly dependent in character were those who had grown up under the authority of the priest.

Miss FLORENCE HILL said that she had hoped for some word on Temperance work, and referred to what Miss Johnson, of Liverpool, had done in the matter of the supply of drink to children.

A Mahommedan gentleman also expressed his sympathy with Unitarian work, and said that in the absence of places of worship of their own he always advised his fellow-believers in this country to attend Unitarian chapels.

A cordial vote of thanks to Miss Tagart, moved by Mr. W. H. SHRUBSOLE concluded the meeting, which was followed by tea.

ESSEX HALL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE Annual Meeting of the Essex Hall Temperance Association was held on Friday, June 8. In the unavoidable absence of the Earl of Carlisle the chair was occupied by Mr. T. Pallister Young, LL.B., Chairman of Committee, and there was a good attendance of members of the Association from the country as well as from various parts of the Metropolis. In moving the adoption of the report, which showed a membership of fifty-seven affiliated societies and 124 individual members, with an expenditure during the year of £59 1s. 6½d. and a balance in hand of £8 4s. 7½d., the CHAIRMAN called attention to the facilities offered by the executive to affiliated societies for obtaining copies of Young Days at half-price, also the free use of lantern slides, diagrams, &c. The legislative aspect of the Temperance movement was receiving attention at present owing to the report of Lord Peel's Commission, and Mr. YOUNG gave instances of the manner in which licenses refused on first application could be obtained with ease by publicans on appeal.

The adoption of the report was seconded by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, in an eloquent address in which he referred to the great progress the Temperance movement had made among ministers. At the time he commenced active temperance work, more than fifty years ago, abstaining ministers of Unitarian and Free Christian congregations could be counted on the fingers of one hand, and now there were many ministers of the denomination working with them. The report showed good work done during the past year, and he cordially approved the co-operation with temperance organisations of other churches in a pledge-signing campaign. There were two temperance measures now before Parliament, and he trusted every temperance worker would do all he possibly could to promote the successful carrying out of the Bills. In conclusion, Mr. STEINTHAL regretted he could not support the recommendation of the Committee re change of name, as he objected to the introduction of theological questions into matters of social reform.

The election of officers was moved by the Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, and seconded by the Rev. A. HARVIE, who referred to the successful temperance meeting organised by the Association at Leicester, and said that the great need of the day was moral earnestness.

A resolution that the name of the Association in future be the "Unitarian Temperance Association" was then moved by the honorary secretary, Mr. BREDALL, who pointed out the disabilities the executive were under in co-operating with kindred societies. The term "Essex Hall" conveyed no idea that the Association had any connection with Unitarian churches, and in lists of temperance societies the Association was frequently classified under the letter E without any indication that it was any more than a small local society meeting in a hall called Essex Hall, instead of being a national organisation representing the temperance life of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches. He had experienced great difficulty in correspondence with other societies, and also in forwarding resolutions passed by the Association to members of the Government. Reports of public meetings organised by the Association had appeared in newspapers prefaced by the remark: "A society calling itself the Essex Hall Temperance Association," &c. He strongly urged the adoption of some title which should indicate the denominational character of the Association, and could see no more objection to the use of the word "Unitarian" than there was in the titles of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the London District Unitarian Society. He presumed the objectors to the proposed change would hardly be prepared to recommend the titles B. and F. Essex Hall Association or L. D. Essex Hall Society. Such titles would effectively cripple the work done by these societies.

Mr. H. NOEL seconded the resolution.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, in opposing, asked the meeting to pause before adopting the suggestion. It appeared to him that the proposal was a very dangerous innovation, and he feared that the reopening of the question might lead the way to endless controversies.

The Rev. F. K. FREESTON (the first secretary of the Association) urged most strongly the undesirability of the change, and pointed out that in forming the Society the matter had received very careful consideration, and it was felt that in fixing the title a name had been selected which would give rise to no theological controversy. The Association did not ask its members what church they belonged to, and was not formed to compete with other associations. Should the title be changed the constitution would have to be altered to correspond.

The Rev. W. C. BOWIE said he entirely disagreed with many of the arguments of the previous speaker. The Society was an organisation finding its element among Unitarian Churches, and he could not realise the force of the objections which had been raised to the resolution. At the same time, as it appeared evident that a number of earnest supporters of the Association felt strongly opposed to the proposal, he suggested its withdrawal and the adoption of some other means to meet the difficulties which had been referred to.

Mr. WESTALL, Mr. R. MONTFORD, and Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR supported the resolution. The Rev. C. J. STREET, and the Rev. A. ASHWORTH also spoke.

Eventually on the motion of the Rev. W. C. POPE, seconded by the Rev. J. C. STREET the question was referred back to the Committee.

The Rev. J. C. STREET moved, and the Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded, that this meeting urges H.M.'s Government to facilitate the passing into law of the Bill now before Parliament prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drink to children under sixteen years of age.

This was supported by the Rev. W. C. BOWIE who urged friends to write to their local M.P.'s urging them to support the "Children's Bill." Mr. BOWIE gave an account of the meeting of the American Unitarian Society which he had attended at Boston, and delivered a message of cordial greeting from that Society to the Essex Hall Temperance Association. The resolution was carried unanimously.

On the motion of the Rev. C. J. STREET, seconded by Mr. R. MONTFORD, a resolution was passed urging the Government to support the Bill extending Sunday Closing of Public Houses to Monmouthshire, and the meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the Chairman on the motion of the Rev. L. TAVENER, seconded by Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR.

OPINION ON THE WAR.

MEETING AT CLIFFORD'S INN.

ON Thursday afternoon, June 7, a meeting was held at Clifford's Inn Hall, Fleet-street, the objects being, as the circular convening the meeting said,

To give Unitarians attending the Whitsuntide Meetings, and other friends, an opportunity of meeting, to consider our duty with regard to the War in South Africa, of expressing a desire for a just and peaceful settlement which shall recognise the principle of Nationality, and of protesting against the suppression of free speech in England.

It was further stated that "all who sympathise with the objects of this meeting, of whatever sect or party, will be welcome." Apparently non-sympathisers took the hint and stayed away, as the meeting which completely filled the Hall was throughout undisturbed by any dissentient voice or vote.

Dr. LAWSON DODD, of Tunbridge Wells, and Wimpole-street, W., was in the chair, and first called on the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed to read some letters received from sympathisers, among them the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. In opening the meeting the CHAIRMAN said the country had not realised the gravity of the situation, and the Christian Church as a whole had failed to keep Christ's principles before the nation. He was glad that a small section at least had met to testify against the growing trust in materialism and in merely outer victory, and to recall men to the silent but eternal influences which they had forgotten. It was said by some that "physical force was the last resort between nations"; he denied that. It was goodwill that was the really final appeal, for violence and vengeance lead to unending strife, while the power of love causes strife to cease.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, in moving the first resolution, declared his conviction that the whole policy which had led to this war had been planned for that purpose, and if they were to judge a policy as well as a man by the company it kept, what could they think of that which was so closely associated with the Raid, with the shocking fiasco of the Parliamentary Commission, with the military spirit everywhere rampant, with the suppression of free speech, and with the delight in brutal sentiment shown by popular cartoons? Up till now the partition of Poland had been the standard illustration of the evil spirit of reckless spoliation and conquest, but it was a crime done by despots. He considered the case worse now, for here was a nation professing to believe in righteousness while it suppressed nationalities weaker than itself. He knew that some of the Churches had spoken in the name of the "God of Battles," whatever deity or demon that might be; but none of them had spoken in the name of "God, our Father"—if they had, the very name would rebuke them. He moved:—

That this Meeting earnestly desires such a just and peaceful settlement on South Africa as shall tend to bring about good will between the English, Dutch, and Native races, and solemnly protests against the annexation of the two Boer Republics.

Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR seconded the motion, and in supporting it the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED said that meeting had become inevitable and necessary in order that they might express their feelings in respect to the present state of affairs. Believing that the indictment brought by Mr. Page Hopps could be proved up to the hilt, they had a practical duty to perform as citizens. They must fully acquaint themselves with the facts not merely of recent history, but of the story of South Africa before the war. Their weight in argument with the forces arrayed against them would be valuable just in proportion as they were real students of this matter; and he would strongly urge his hearers to read the standard authorities, such as Theal, even though they were large works and cost money—the labour and the price were well spent if they came to a sound knowledge of the facts.

Mr. H. L. CURREY (Cape Colony) and Miss EMILY HOBHOUSE also spoke, and the motion on being put was carried unanimously.

The second resolution was moved by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD. It was as follows:—

That this Meeting regrets the violence which has broken up meetings and suppressed the free expression of opinion in many parts of the United Kingdom, and deplores the apathy or neglect of the authorities in not putting a stop to such violence.

Mr. Wood said they must protest against the conspiracy of the great religious organisations to be silent at their Spring Meetings upon this matter, and not to say one word in favour of the application to present affairs of the great principles of righteousness and peace. They had to remember also, with shame, that it was the brutality of the classes as well as of the masses that had tried to suppress free speech. "The Church," it was said, was against them; they did not forget, however, that the clergy of the Southern States had been unanimous in favour of slavery; and this showed clearly that clerical opinion, even when formed "on the spot," was not necessarily the wisest. He felt that what they had to fight was the portentous alliance of plutocracy and militarism. The trial of "finance" was over the whole thing. They were told that nine-tenths of England was against them on this matter. Let it be so now, but he appealed to England "sober." They too loved England, and were for the really "great" England.

The Rev. C. J. STREET seconded the motion, and said they would go home feeling encouraged by the knowledge that there was, after all, a great deal of sympathy for the sentiments expressed at that meeting.

The Revs. F. H. JONES, J. C. STREET, and J. T. SUNDERLAND, also spoke, and Mr. HODGSON PRATT concluded the discussion by an earnest appeal to Unitarians to press home the principles of Christianity which had been hitherto so superficially believed in; to rouse the conscience of the nation and prevent the worse evils which must surely follow if the passion and policy now accepted were persisted in.

The motion was carried unanimously, and after a vote of thanks to the Chairman the proceedings terminated.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—An open-air address on the Broadhill on Sunday afternoon, by the Rev. Alexander Webster was (says the Daily Free Press) the occasion of renewal of the riotous scenes which have occurred several times in Aberdeen since the date of Mr. Cronwright Schreiner's abortive stop-the-war meeting in the Trades Hall. The demonstration, which was the work of a crowd of youths, whose attentions were directed solely against Mr. Webster and his wife and a party of friends, did not take place until the close of the meeting, when the rev. gentleman and his friends were followed on their way homewards by a considerable crowd, whose catchword was "Pro-Boer," and which indulged in a good deal of stone-throwing. It had been advertised that Mr. Webster would deliver the first of a series of addresses on the subject of "What is this? A new teaching" (Mark i. 27, Revised Version), and the invitation to the public as printed on handbills was to the following effect:—"You ought to know what learned men in the light of modern knowledge are thinking and saying on religious questions. They have given up the old ideas, and are teaching new and better thoughts. Come and hear the Rev. Alexander Webster state their views on the Broadhill." The subject yesterday was "The Bible viewed by learned men," and the address was delivered at three o'clock in the afternoon at the natural amphitheatre at the south end of the Broadhill. This is the first occasion on which Mr. Webster, who has addressed meetings there for the last twelve years, has spoken in the afternoon, the reason being that the evenings at present are too cold for such gatherings. When Mr. Webster arrived about three o'clock, a crowd of about 300 people had assembled, and the gathering rapidly increased until there must have been about 4,000 people on the slopes of the hill. A large proportion of the audience, which included many women, was seated round the preacher, and in front there was a group of about 200 youngsters, who had evidently come for a row. Throughout the meeting these boys were noisy and restless, while the general mass of the people were exceedingly quiet. Mr. Webster's discourse was based on the utterances of a number of leading men with a view to giving the modern learned ideas of the Bible. He quoted from Professor Robertson Smith's "The Old Testament and the Jewish Church" to show that "The Bible has to be read and explained like other ancient books," and supported this position by referring to the writings of Dr. Marcus Dodds, Professor Evans, Cincinnati University; Dean Farrar, the Rev. George C. Lorimer, D.D., editor of "The People's Bible History"; Dr. Walter C. Smith, Mr. R. H. Hutton, and Professor Bruce. During the address, which lasted three-quarters of an hour, there was no interruption beyond some disturbance amongst the boys aforementioned, who were flinging sods at each other. The general crowd was quite orderly, though at the end they pressed close in upon the preacher and a clamour arose. Questions were invited, but as none were asked, the meeting was declared closed. Mr. Webster and his companions then moved away along the Links towards Cotton-street, followed by a considerable crowd of boys and youths, who began to throw stones. Mr. Webster was struck several times, and his wife received a nasty blow over the left eye. A number of policemen were on the ground, and though they could not suppress the stone-throwing, they drew a cordon across the east end of Cotton-street, and so enabled Mr. Webster and his friends to escape further serious molestation. A few stragglers continued to annoy them all the way to Bon-Accord-street, where the party took refuge in the house of a friend, and later in the afternoon they reached Concord House in peace. It is alleged that the boys came to the meeting with their pockets full of stones, with the deliberate intention of pelting Mr. Webster, who (adds our contemporary), with whatever warrant, is widely regarded as the personification of pro-Boerism. Personally, he states the curious thing is he is not a pro-Boer, though he is opposed to the war, and thinks that patience and diplomacy might have averted hostilities.

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—This chapel, after extensive renovation inside and out, was re-opened on Whit Sunday. At the morning service, conducted by the minister, the Rev. J. J. Wright, a collection was taken up in aid of the Indian Famine. In the afternoon a united gathering of scholars, teachers, and friends from Atherton, Leigh, Astley, Hindley, and Park-lane was held, when the service was conducted by the Rev. R. C. Moore, and the address given by Mr. Walter Simpson, and a collection taken up in aid of the funds of the Bolton District Sunday School Union. The combined collections realised about £18. The decorations of the chapel ceiling and walls were much admired. Of course, the fine old black panelled oak of the pulpits, galleries, and pews remains as it has been since 1722, when this chapel was opened (the oldest chapel dating from 1645). The anxiety of the congregation, in regard to the decorations, &c., has been to keep up the character of the building. By calling in a specialist in church and chapel decorating—Mr. Reuben Bennett, of Manchester—they have been able to do this. The ceiling is finished in shades of cream and ivory, relieved with bands of lily ornamentation, with columns of soft celestial grey. All the work is in a very soft tone, and gives a most pleasing effect. A cornice round the ceiling gives the whole a very finished appearance. The walls have been painted and decorated in tones of golden terra-cotta in three shades, which harmonise well with the dark oak woodwork. A lily decoration runs round the window on the face of the walls. The decorator has carefully studied the character of the building, and the designs are most suitable. The old and much-worn leaded lights will be replaced with new ones of good though simple design, and new windows of toned glass and leaded frames will be substituted for the present ones. The outside of the building, the vestry, &c., have also received attention. The ladies of the congregation have undertaken to carpet the whole of the aisles and stairways with a shade of Brussels to match the fine old oak woodwork and the tone of the walls. The young people have presented a folio gilt-edge Bible (Revised Version) for the pulpit, a lady member of the congregation has promised new plush cushions for the pulpits, and another member has promised to provide a new organ. A scheme is also in hand for the enlargement of the school-rooms—day and Sunday. The whole cost of these alterations and decorations, exclusive of organ, &c., is over £700, which the congregation are raising among themselves by subscriptions. The tennis-ground and bowling-green in connection with the chapel and schools have also just been re-opened, after great improvements. A mural tablet of Carrara marble has been placed in the chapel "in loving memory of the late Miss Salter," a generous benefactor to this congregation," and a memorial brass is about to be placed near the pulpit in honour of the late Mr. T. H. Hope. Following his usual custom, which is much appreciated by the congregation here, Mr. Wright gave, in place of the evening sermon on Sunday last, "A Talk about the London Meetings," having preached in the morning on "Trinity Sunday." In the afternoon he told the whole assembled school something of the story of Essex Hall, from Theophilus Lindsey's day to our own.

Bath.—On Tuesday the annual treat of the scholars of Trim-street Sunday-school was held. The children and adult friends travelled to the Zoological Gardens, Clifton, where a most enjoyable time was spent.

Derby.—The members and friends of the congregation held a well-attended excursion on Whit-Monday, and on the following day the scholars had tea and outdoor games as usual.

London: George's-row.—On Tuesday last the annual party in connection with the Mothers' meetings took place, when about 120 persons sat down to tea. The rooms were gaily decorated with flowers, kindly sent by friends, who are gratefully thanked for them. Mrs. Enfield, Mrs. A. Lawrence, Mrs. Summers, Miss E. M. Lawrence, Miss C. A. Lawrence, Miss Lake, Miss Ethel Lake, Miss Spurgeon, Miss Kleiter, Miss Boehme, Mrs. Benn, Mrs. Watson, Mrs. Parker, Mrs. Hill, and the Rev. Frederick Summers were present to assist. Mr. A. E. Summers, Mr. W. Bell, Miss L. Williams, Miss E. Spickernell, and Miss L. Johnson gave a dramatic sketch. In connection with the Window Gardening Society, registration of plants has this week taken place. This year arrangements have been made for the annual excursion to Cheam.

London: Peckham.—By the indefatigable exertions of Mr. W. R. Marshall, the Sunday-school secretary, the church in Avondale-road was most beautifully decorated on Sunday last, the occasion of the annual Sunday-school and floral services. The attendance, morning and evening, was good, that in the evening being especially satisfactory. An interesting floral service, largely musical, was held for the scholars in the afternoon, conducted by the assistant superintendent, Mr. J. C. Griffin, the address on the words, "Like one of these," being given by the Rev. G. Carter, superintendent. A collection on behalf of the Sunday-school Fund was taken at each service.

Manchester: Goulden-street Ministry to the Poor.—On Whit-Saturday, through the kindness of Mrs. James Worthington, the Rev. B. Walker took over sixty children and adults of the Mission to Sale Lodge, where, as last year, they were most hospitably entertained, and spent a very happy day. One old man of eighty-five being impressed by the contrast of the Lodge grounds with the dismal court in which he lives in the city, told us that he desired no better heaven than to sit and smoke and enjoy himself in such pleasant company and amid such surroundings.

Rademon.—The Rev. J. Joseph Magill, B.A., announced to his congregation on Sunday week that he had declined a call from the Non-subscribing congregation at Dromore. Great pleasure was expressed by the congregation at an impromptu meeting which followed the service (Mr. W. Davidson, J.P., presiding), and a vote of thanks to Mr. Magill for his decision was proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. M'Robert, supported by Dr. Porter, and carried unanimously.

Reading.—The children's flower service was held on Sunday, May 27. Flowers brought by the children were arranged so as to produce a bright and picturesque effect. In the morning Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., gave an appropriate address; and in the evening preached on "Lessons from the Flowers." The church was well filled at each service, and a special service of song was given in the morning.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The annual Children's Sunday-school Outing took place on Whit-Monday last at Lightwood, a pretty country spot some six miles from the city. The children numbered nearly 200, and there were about fifty to sixty visitors, in addition to teachers and other helpers.

Stannington.—On Whit-Monday the children of the Underbank Sunday-school paraded the village as usual, singing appropriate hymns at intervals. The children were regaled with a bounteous tea, after which about 120 teachers, old scholars and friends sat down. The remainder of the evening was pleasantly spent in a field, kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. G. H. Revitt. The anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 10, the preacher being the Rev. John Fox, of Leeds. Favoured with beautiful weather, the congregations, both in the afternoon and evening, were large and appreciative.

Stourbridge District Sunday-school Union.—The Whit-Monday festival of 1900 was held at Stourbridge, service being conducted in the Presbyterian Chapel by the Rev. Dendy Agate, of Altrincham. The service was well attended by the teachers and scholars of the four schools forming the Union. An interesting and practical address and singing, which evidenced careful musical training, rewarded those friends who gave up a Bank Holiday afternoon in fine weather to encourage their Sunday-schools. About 190 tickets were sold for the tea which followed at the Wollaston-road schools, and after tea a hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Dendy Agate for his address. A neighbouring field was available for sports in the evening, by the kindness of Mr. Sharpe. Most of the scholars found suitable amusement in the field, but a large party assembled for an interesting ramble, which had been arranged under the leadership of Mr. G. Evers and the Secretary of the Union. The route taken led to the monument on Wychbury Hill, erected in honour of Frederick Prince of Wales, from the base of which there was an extensive and beautiful view of the scenery which inspired the verse of Thomson and Shenstone. A short walk through the pleasant Worcestershire lanes brought the party to Hagley Station for the journey home, and here the Kidderminster section rejoined the scholars who had remained in Stourbridge. The difficulty many of our friends find in joining us on a Bank Holiday, when family excursions are common, prevents our attendances being so large as we could wish, but the Union receives sufficient support from the local ministers and teachers to make its meetings successful and helpful.

Urmston.—It is now four months since the congregation entered the new church, and though not much time has elapsed, there has been sufficient opportunity for it to acquire some experience in its new home. After the large congregations which assembled for the special services of the first few weeks, the attendance has settled down to an average of nearly fifty at each service, which is a substantial and gratifying increase on the numbers present last year, when services were held in the Public Hall. The new buildings are giving general satisfaction; and steps are being taken for a more extensive use of them next winter. At present the Rev. Priestley Prime is minister-in-charge, assisted by the Mr. Alfred Davison, who will finish his course of studies at the Home Missionary College in July. The Sunday-school is also making progress; the attendances are better, and there is a slight increase in the number of scholars on the roll. Through the initiative of Mr. Nuttall, a "Rambling Club" has been formed; and the School Committee are arranging for quarterly services to be held in the church for the young people with the object of uniting school and congregation. On Wednesday, June 6, the school had its Whitsuntide treat. After games in a field at Flixton, tea was served in the New School, and subsequently there was an entertainment and distribution of prizes to successful scholars by Mr. Prime.

Whitchurch.—On Sunday, June 10, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held, the preacher being the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, of Birmingham, who gave three eloquent discourses. Special hymns were sang by the children, Miss Dodd presiding at the organ. The congregations were good, and the collections very satisfactory.

The sermon preached by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., at the British and Foreign Unitarian Associations Anniversary, last week, is printed in this week's issue of the Christian World Pulpit. The other preachers there represented this week are Canon Wilberforce, Dr. Stalker, Canon Gore, and the Rev. F. W. Macdonald, President of the Wesleyan Conference—a remarkable conjunction.

Country Holiday Movement.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—A. K. and Friends, £1 4s. 6d.; Miss M. Howse, £1; Miss Garrett, £1; Mrs. F. Morton, £1.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE colleges are once more closing their sessions. At Manchester College, Oxford, the "annual proceedings" will take place on Thursday and Friday next; the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, holds its meetings earlier in the same week, and the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, in the week following. The usual valedictory service will be held at Oxford on Thursday evening, when the Principal, the Rev. Dr. Drummond, will give the farewell address, and the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson the welcome into the ministry. The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will also address the students on Friday at twelve. There do not appear to be many student candidates for our vacant pulpits this year: the need of a succession of genuine preachers and pastors was never more urgent. The kind of man required is, if we may say so, fairly indicated in the Rev. John Byles's paper given in our issue this week. Failing the heaven-sent students, suppose the men already "settled" (a long time ago, it may be) each make a good try to be that man!

A FEW weeks ago the Rev. J. T. Sunderland sent an appeal for the Indian Famine Sufferers to the Christian Register of Boston, U.S.A., and as a result has received this week four hundred dollars (£81 19s. 4d.), which has been handed to Mr. Pritchard, to be forwarded to our Brahmo Somaj Famine Relief Committee in India. There are intimations that more will come from the same source. It has recently come to our knowledge that one of our friends on Consular duty in China has been made the medium of Chinese sympathy for the starving Indians, no less a sum than £1,400 having been subscribed and given to him to forward to the authorities. "He hath made of one all nations"—alas! that the unity should be broken.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.—Mr. Ion Pritchard acknowledges receipt of the following donations:—Amount already acknowledged, £1,751 13s. 9d.; A Friend, 5s.; G. M. H., £1; E. C. B., £1; Employés Wm. Jardine and Co., £2 17s. 9d.; Ballee Unitarian Congregation, £8; Kettering-road Sunday-school, Northampton, £7 0s. 6d.; Mrs. Pritchard, £1; H. M. Y., £2 15s.; Widow's Mite, £1 1s.; Mr. J. Harrison, £5 5s.; Mr. E. H. New, £1 1s.; Mrs. E. Griffith, £5; Maidstone Unitarian Chapel, £4 10s. 3d.; Betty, 10s.; Mr. C. W. Mellor, 200 rupees; Mr. W. Slatter, £1 1s.; Messrs. H. and F. Dale, £1 5s.; X. X., £2; Readers of Christian Register, Boston, by Mr. R. C. Humphreys, £81 19s. 4d.; Mrs. Basley, 5s.; Chorley Chapel, £4 16s.; Rev. J. J. Wright, £1 1s.; Chowbent Congregation, £9 12s. 7d.; Scholars and Teachers, Hull Sunday-school, £1 6s.; W. H. D., 1s.; Glanrhondda Unitarian Church, 10s.; Mr. S. Gould, £1; Total, £1,897 16s. 2d.; Contributions may be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

The New Dispensation (Calcutta), May 5, after giving some particulars as to the labours of the Brahmo Somaj relief agents in distributing food, potable water, clothes, and medicine in the famine districts, adds:—

May God give strength of body and soul to our workers to carry on this good work, and may the blessing of each poor sufferer that is saved reach and sweeten with the peace which is not of this earth, the soul of each of those generous contributors whose names as published in the weekly list of THE INQUIRER have brought the tears to our eyes!

THE interesting American notes supplied to us by Mr. Copeland Bowie this week do not tell us what the Christian Register says of himself as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the Boston anniversaries. But we on this side are quite prepared to hear that he "won all hearts by his manly sincerity and sympathetic speech." The same journal has an appropriate word to say with regard to all the other visitors, British and Foreign, who represented Unitarian and liberal Christianity as it appears in their respective countries—Mr. Hargrove, Miss Pritchard, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Professor Boros (Hungary), Professor Oppert (Germany), Mr. Hocart (Belgium), Messrs. Murai and Hirai — Japanese accompanying Mr. Clay MacCauley; Mr. Mozoomdar and Mr. Pal. We observe, in passing, that considerable time and attention appear to have been bestowed on these foreign delegates, and a painful consciousness arises that we in England have not always excelled in our arrangements in this respect. We have no doubt, however, that on the occasion of the next international meeting, which it was agreed to hold in London, our visitors will find no lack of courtesy amongst us. Meanwhile we hail with expectancy the proposal to form an International Council of Unitarians and others in sympathy with the attempt "to unite pure religion with perfect liberty."

WE observe also that in the States themselves the forces imbued with this ideal are drawing closer together. One of the first items on the opening day was the reception of a report of a committee which has been in conference with the Universalists. The outcome of their deliberations is the appointment of a joint-committee of Unitarians and Universalists, consisting of five representatives from each body, their function being the harmonising of mission work in new fields, and the promotion of joint meetings between ministers and congregations of the two denominations. After the preliminary business in Lorimer Hall, a migration was made to the great Tremont Hall, where the introduction and speeches of the foreign delegates took place. Professor Boros brought with him a phonogram containing a message from Bishop Ferencz, and he considerately translated the last sentence for the benefit of the audience. Mr. Kinzo Hirai, formerly a Buddhist priest, quoted a Japanese poem, well known, he declared, to the peasants of his country, the meaning of which, he said, was this:—"Although there are many roads which lead to the top of the mountain, all who take these different roads see one and the same moonlight of divine truth." Mr. Hocart began in French, but ended in the English which he knows so well how to use; and, to complete the polyglot, Mr. Mozoomdar intoned some Sanscrit sayings also translated subsequently, affirming the oneness and all-sufficiency of God. In the afternoon of the same day an Icelander, the Rev. Magnus Skaptason, made an earnest plea for help to free his countrymen from the grimness of the old "Gospel" as preached by the believers in in everlasting hell-fire.

ONLY one quotation from the good things spoken that day can be given us now, but it is well worth undivided attention. It is taken from the speech of the Rev. Charles E. St. John. He said:—

There is no longer any uncertainty in the note that we are going to speak to mankind. The orthodox churches are coming to the point of uncertainty. It may be partly our fault, but it is not entirely so. Their own scholars are putting forth thoughts that are producing this uncertainty. This uncertainty seems to many of them so critical as to touch the very foundations of religion. The great missionary Conference held in New York a few days since laid emphasis on the need to the world of hearing Christ preached; but when they go forth to "preach Christ," they strike that note of uncertainty, and know not exactly how to talk about him. When they say, "Let us preach Christ," they mean, Let us preach the love of God, the present redeeming, uplifting power of God in the world; they mean that they would give to mankind the consciousness of the personal nearness of God to every soul, the need that every man shall found his life upon his own personal righteousness, and trust his salvation for the future to that which grows forth in his soul. They are praying to the tenderness in God, our Father, when they pray in the name of Jesus: it is but another word for the more intimate and near aspect of God. I believe any modern Trinitarian would accept that as a true statement. And yet when they use that phrase, there are multitudes who do not understand the phrase; and they throw up before themselves a barrier that stands in the way of their success in lifting up mankind. Somehow, it grows difficult for preachers of the ancient dogmas to make mankind understand what they philosophically mean by the phrases they use. That difficulty we have not to face: there is no uncertainty in the way we talk about Jesus, our Master, or in the way in which we present the tenderness of God. There is a distinct cleavage of thought there whereby we are able to proclaim from each one of our pulpits the nearness and tenderness and forgiveness and love of God, and the leadership of Jesus at the same time.

FANEUIL HALL, Boston, was the scene, on May 31, of a meeting to welcome the Envoys of the South African Republics. On the reception committee were such veterans of the Anti-Slavery struggle as our friends Colonel T. W. Higginson, the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, the Rev. Charles G. Ames, and Mr. Frank B. Sanborn. Among the resolutions passed were the following:—

We speak in no spirit of hostility to the English people, whose true interest we have at heart, and whose friendship we hold second to none. We believe that the innate sense of right and justice in the English people, now misled by ambitious and unscrupulous rulers, will, once aroused, assert itself as it has done in the past.

We declare that every nation has the right to adopt such form of government as may seem to it best calculated to advance those ends for which all Governments are in theory established. We declare, as the citizens of Boston have declared before, that America cannot recognise the right of might, and that we cannot view without protest the absorption of small and weak states by the strong.

We would not have the war prolonged a day, nor a drop of blood shed through vain hopes of armed intervention. We do, however, urge our Government to make known to the Government of Great Britain, in any proper manner, the sentiment of our people, and, jointly if possible with other Powers, and with that quick sympathy for men struggling for liberty the wide world over which was the glory of the fathers of our Republic, to use every means in its power to advance in the present crisis the ends of justice and humanity. If, in spite of all, a great crime is committed, darkening the closing days of the century, if these Republics are finally blotted out of existence, let it be known that it is done against the solemn protest of the American people.

It is proper to add that while prominent Unitarians like those named above take the side here represented, there is a very sharp division of feeling on the subject amongst our American brethren.

MR. BIPIN CHANDRA PAL, whose energetic character and Oriental eloquence will be freshly remembered by many of our readers, passed through London last week on his way to India, which he left nearly two years ago to enter Manchester College, Oxford. With the full concurrence of those concerned, Mr. Pal left the College at the close of one year's study, and spent the early part of last winter in public work, chiefly in connection with temperance, in different parts of England. Subsequently, by arrangement with Mr. W. S. Caine, he visited the United States, where he has engaged in similar work during the past five months.

IN regard to temperance work in the States, Mr. Pal was impressed with the feeling that the leading citizens are not engaged in it to the extent that obtains in this country. Nevertheless, both there and here he recognises a prevailing temperament and practical view of things at large which he would gladly add, if it were possible, to the idealistic moods of his own countrymen; out of such a combination he would expect the more perfect humanity to arise. He has seen a good deal of our Unitarian circles on both sides of the Atlantic, and retains grateful memories of the many kindnesses shown to him and the stimulating intercourse he has enjoyed. His last little experience of the kind took place at Essex Hall on Friday last week, when he shared the parting cup—which not inebriates—with a few friends, including Mr. Ion Pritchard, Chairman of the Indian Subcommittee of the B. and F.U.A.; the Revs. J. T. Sunderland and J. Harwood, each of whom has done missionary work in India; and the Secretary. It may not be generally known that before going to America Mr. Pal wrote a very useful little pamphlet, entitled "A Brief Account of the Brahmo Samaj; or the Hindu Church of the Divine Unity"; copies of which may be obtained gratis by writing to Essex Hall. MRS. MADELINE COLE sends us the following letter, received from Dr. Raynolds, of Van, Armenia:—

I think there has been no time in the history of this relief work when the pressure for help has been so great as it is at the present time. Not perhaps that the real need is so much greater than last year, but the money that is coming for relief is so much less that the suffering is immensely greater. I have been able to make one somewhat general distribution, but our distributors who went out for one section, for instance, though they tried to be extremely careful, used up all the funds granted them, while several villages remained unattended to, and these villages were really the most needy in the district. The appeals which come from these villages are enough to melt a heart of stone. Children are brought in wasted almost to skeletons, and they tell of many unable to leave their houses, while the majority of the population have absolutely nothing to eat but the vegetables and roots which they can gather, not even a little flour or grain to put with them to make a soup. From one village where we have one of our boys teaching, almost daily deaths from hunger are reported. I am thankful that your contribution and one or two other small sums which have come in, have enabled me to give out a little to two of the worst villages, but how I am going to get along about the appeals from the others, I do not know. It is hard work to live these days, because we have to refuse such a constant stream of applications for help of all kinds. During the previous years of these difficulties, we have had enough in our hands to enable us to do something for most of the desperate cases, and thus the suffering has been kept within bounds, and the pain of absolutely refusing aid has been largely spared us. One of the saddest features of the situation is the blight it is casting on the future. In order to preserve life at the present moment, the wretched villagers are compelled to sell the product of their fields in advance, and at most ruinous rates, often promising two or three measures of grain for one furnished now, though the present prospect is that an abundant harvest will bring down the price of grain to something like its normal figure. In this way the poor peasants will be compelled to give a large part of what they may raise this year, for supplying the needs of the time then past, and the future will be no brighter than it is now. In such times as these, when the people are thus starving, the Government is pressing for back taxes with relentless severity. Since the massacre the collection of taxes has been remitted, and the people hoped it meant that they were to be entirely remitted for those years, but now every effort is being made to collect the whole amount, and utterly illegal methods, such as compelling the selling of fields and household necessities, are being resorted to to wring money from the utterly prostrate people. They lose heart, and would gladly desert their fields and homes and seek some more hopeful home, but this is impossible. Neither will the Government permit them to go, nor is there any place where they will be admitted. Now and then one manages to evade the authorities and creep across the border at night, but the masses are sinking into utter desperation. The depredations of the Koords also continue, and the Armenian population of this province is fast decreasing.

And now to turn to happier topics. I am happy to say that thus far the prospect for the harvest is unusually fine, but there remain still two months before it will mature, during which the wretched people must support life in some way if they are to survive, and there are yet many possibilities of drought or blight to injure the growing crops. The present appearance of the country is most beautiful, but the conditions by which we are surrounded tune our lives to the minor key, and it sometimes seems as if we could not endure the constant strain.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mrs. Cole (hon. treasurer), "Danehurst," Putney, S.W., or by Francis Buxton, Esq., 50, Cornhill, E.C. The "Friends of Armenia" Committee also write urging the necessity of immediate help at this time.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTER AS PROPHET.*

BY THE REV. JOHN BYLES.

THE word prophet in modern English has been badly treated. It has been used as if its chief or only meaning were that of a foreteller. Even Dr. Johnson, in his dictionary published in 1755, gives this, in various synonyms, as the only definition. Happily in our own day, partly as the result of more careful study of the Bible, and partly of a general improvement in scholarship, the word has recovered its true meaning, the meaning in which it was used a century before the time of Johnson by Jeremy Taylor in his celebrated essay on "Liberty of Prophesying."

The prophet, then, is no mere soothsayer. He is no mere diviner gratifying the curiosity of men in respect of that which shall be hereafter. He is something nobler and grander. He is a spokesman for God, an interpreter of His will; he is an exponent of His thought, a preacher of His truth. Incidentally he may, of course, anticipate the future as the outcome of the present—its nemesis, or its reward—but his work and his message are mainly concerning the present. Moses, Samuel, Elijah, all of them were prophets, but the work of all of them was with the present rather than the future. Isaiah was essentially a "man of the times"—a factor in the making of his country's history; a power to be reckoned with by King and people.

A prophet is one who sees into the heart of things, and sees as one taught of God. It was "the word that Isaiah the Son of Amos saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem." He is no scribe repeating with wearisome iteration the shibboleth of a party. He is no priest offering unneeded sacrifices, or manipulating unsatisfying rites. He is an ambassador, a messenger, a man charged with a mystery, which it is given him to declare. He is a voice, crying, and often in the wilderness. He speaks with authority—the authority of conviction, the authority of spiritual insight, the authority of a man who has commerce with the Unseen. His message is a present message, applicable to the times in which he lives and the men by whom he is surrounded. His prophetic word, as the apostle teaches, is "for edification, for exhortation, for comfort." Such is the work of the Christian minister.

Others besides ministers are "called" to the prophetic office; to others does the word of the Lord come; and by others have sacrifices to be made if a man would faithfully deliver the word that he receives. To writers of books, to editors of newspapers, to men of affairs, the word is addressed. In the generation now passing away there have been many such prophets, both here and among our brethren across the Atlantic. God, in this respect, has greatly favoured us, the men of the latter half of the nineteenth century. Whether such voices can be heard as freely to-day is a question I will not try to answer.

Others, as well as ministers, are called to be prophets. And it is certainly no wish of ours to discredit or belittle them. Rather would we say with Moses: "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets."

But of us, as the ministers, this is, or ought to be, pre-eminently true. To this office we have been called; to its discharge we have consecrated our lives. If we are not prophets, we are nothing.

But if this be true of every Christian minister, it is especially true of ourselves, as ministers of free and undogmatic churches. We are not priests. We repudiate the name; we lay no claim to the function or the powers which the name implies. Nor are we scribes. We have no system to expound, no articles to enforce, no articulated creed to defend. We are ministers of the Word. As we receive the truth, we declare it. We are, or should be, spokesmen for God.

Now it is obvious that so great an office demands great qualifications. And the men who are the most fitted for the office are those who are most conscious of its needs.

Let me enumerate some of the prophet's needs.

(1) There should be first, then, a Call, like that which came to the fishermen of Galilee—"Follow me and I will make you fishers of men"—like that which, a little earlier, had come to their Master, in the synagogue at Nazareth. And the more distinct the call, the stronger will the man be, in after days, to discharge his office and to endure its trials.

(2) There should be, second, a Waiting upon God—a listening for the word of God—an "uncovering of the ear" that His secret whispers may be heard. And this implies, of necessity, a moral fitness, a disentanglement from the world, a repression of self. It is the man who does the will, who knows the doctrine.

(3) There must be in the prophet moral courage—an absence of that "fear of man which bringeth a snare." The man must not be afraid to stand alone. He must be ready, if need be, to be in a minority of one with God. Like the prophet Ezekiel, he must dare to say, "Thus saith the Lord," whether men will hear or whether they will forbear.

(4) There must be, lastly, a readiness to pay the price of fidelity, and, if occasion arise, to accept the cross. There never was an age, or a land, in which the prophet was not stoned. The method varies according to the times, but the spirit is the same. Hence it is that the Christian minister, if he would be a prophet, must not look for ease, or applause, or official notice, or worldly prosperity, or success. He must take his reward, and find his blessedness, in quite other ways.

Let me now suggest three reasons why, at this present time, there is a special need of prophets.

(1) Theologically, we are in a period of transition: change is everywhere. The most conservative of men do not think, if they think at all, as they did thirty years ago. There is the crumbling away of props and stays which a generation back seemed to be immovable. The result is that men of a certain type are losing their religious convictions. And, unhappily, they are giving up, not simply the accidental and the separable, but the essential and the eternal. At such periods it is that prophets are needed—men who can see into the heart of things, and who know how to separate the kernel from the husk. At such times the men who are needed for the preacher's office are men who are able to testify from their own experience of the reality of things which are unseen—men who are able to say "we know whom we have believed." If this generation is to be saved from the numbing touch of unbelief it must be, not by priests administering rites, not by scribes repeating formulas, but by prophets—by men who "wait upon God," "who uncover the ear," who, like the young Isaiah in Jerusalem, see the Lord "sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and his train filling the temple."

(2) Around us to-day, as round the Hebrew prophets eight centuries B.C., are evil and wrong, injustice and vice; and these need to be rebuked. It would be no difficult thing to draw a parallel between the condition of things existing in England to-day and the condition of things in Samaria when Amos, the herdman of Tekoa, lifted up his voice. There is a like striving after luxury and pleasure and ease, a like awful disparity between rich poor, and in some quarters, though, thank God, by no means in all, a like indifference regarding it. Mammon—a far greater power now than then—is still worshipped; and intemperance, common among the great ladies of Samaria, is not unknown among the women of England. Impurity, rife in Israel, is, alas, rife also in this land. As a nation we profess to be Christian, but the principles by which we are ruled are too often those of the world rather than of Christ. So it is that at times we are tempted to say what Wordsworth said exactly a century ago:—

> Plain living and high thinking are no more,
> The homely beauty of the good old Cause
> Is gone—Our Peace—our fearful Innocence
> And pure Religion, breathing Household laws.

For the sake of English virtue, English honour, and English happiness, and that we, as a people, may be rescued from those things by which nations are first corrupted and then ruined, we need prophets.

(3) Another reason why prophets will be needed during the coming half century is this. During the coming fifty years it is inevitable but there should be, in English life, a clashing of conflicting interests. The truce between "the men who have and the men who have not" will not be perpetual. Men will ask not so much how wealth is to be created, but how, being created, it may be rightly diffused. When this strife arises there will be need for prophets—men who can go back to first principles and, like the youthful prophet in Egypt, intervene between the combatants, and say: "Sirs, ye are brethren, why do ye wrong one to another?" For these reasons there will still be need of prophets.

Men talk as if the work of the preacher were ended and his office henceforth useless. It would be nearer the truth to say that his work is only beginning. Only it must be of the right sort, and different in many ways from what it has been sometimes in the past. The preaching of the future must not consist of essays on the unknowable, or of the repetition of dogmas, or of pleasant platitudes. What will be needed, then as now, will be a living word that deals with the present—present duties, present sins, present dangers, and present possibilities of deliverance. Let preachers arise with such a message, and they will be heard—as certainly as was Amos in the streets of Samaria, as was Savonarola in the great duomo of Florence, as was Hugh Latimer here at St. Paul's. As Lowell puts it:—

* Paper read at the Ministers' Conference, Essex Hall, June 7.

While swings the sea, while mists the mountains shroud,
While thunder's surges burst on cliffs of Cloud,
Still at the prophet's feet nations sit.

JOHN POMFRETT, PARSON AND POET.

NONCONFORMIST historians are naturally very much inclined to study the seventeenth century for its political and religious interest, which is certainly, to them, of the first importance. It witnessed the close of the reign of Elizabeth, which consolidated the English Reformation. It embraced the struggle for religious liberty which came to its climax, but found only a temporary success, with the execution of Charles I. The Civil War, the Commonwealth, the Restoration, the persecution of Nonconformists, the Revolution, and ultimately the granting of Toleration are all included in this stirring century—we are apt to think that the thoughts of Englishmen must have been entirely absorbed in these great and critical movements and events. But it was not so; another and a very different aspect of the times is represented in its literary life and expansion. Taking only its best known poets, we are reminded of the intellectual life which was being lived, for the most part, not indifferent to, but apart from the religious and political excitement. Shakespeare himself lived into the seventeenth year of the century; Waller was born in 1605, Milton 1608, Butler 1612, Denham 1615, Cowley 1618, Dryden 1631, Addison 1672, Parnell 1679, Pope 1688, and the close of the century saw the birth of Thomson.

Amongst the minor poets there is none more interesting than the Rev. Mr. John Pomfret, as he is called on his title-page (tenth edition, 1736). Pomfrett's "Choice" was at one time one of the most popular poems in the English language, but it is probably now seldom read. John Pomfrett* was the son of the Rev. Thomas Pomfrett, vicar of Luton, of whose famous parish church a voluminous and valuable history was written by the late Rev. Henry Cobbe, rector of Maulden, a well-known scholar and antiquary, and brother of Miss Frances Power Cobbe. (This history of Luton Church has only just been published posthumously.)

Thomas Pomfrett was both vicar of Luton (1660-1705) and rector of Maulden. There is some doubt about the date of the birth of his son John, the poet. In the anonymous biography prefixed to his "Remains," it is stated that he went up to London about the year 1703, and died there, soon after, in his thirty-sixth year. Mr. Cobbe states, however, that the poet died on Nov. 25, 1702, and not in 1703; but he can find no record of his birth or baptism. But there is an entry of the birth of a son, Thomas, March 12, 1667-8, and it has been conjectured that this should have been "John." But if the date were correct John would only have been about twenty years of age when he became curate of Maulden, which is improbable. However, John took his B.A. degree at Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1684, and he was made curate of Maulden in 1688. His father appears to have been non-resident rector of Maulden, and resigned the living in favour of his son in 1695. On Sept. 13, 1691, John Pomfrett was married in Luton Church to Elizabeth Wingate.

"Some Account of Mr. Pomfrett and his Writings, prefixed to his Remains," is very brief but highly interesting. One allusion is curious, as illustrating the contempt in which Dissenters were held after the granting of Toleration. The writer says:—"So far was he from being in the least tinctured with fanaticism, that I have often heard him express his abhorrence of the destructive tenets maintained by those people, both against our religious and civil rights. This imputation, it seems, was cast on him, by there having been one of his surname, though not in any way related to him, a Dissenting teacher who died not long ago—Mr. Samuel Pomfrett, who published some rimes upon spiritual subjects, as they are pleased to call them."

Fanatic as a synonym for Dissenter may be new to some of my readers, but it was a recognised one—at least when spelt with a Φ. In the Baptismal Register, St. Michael's, Gloucester, James Forbes is described as a "Phanatic teacher." Bailey (an "Universal Etymological English Dictionary) thus defines it: "Phanatic (of φαινω, to appear, Gr.)—one that pretends to Revelations and New Lights, one that hath vain visions and apparitions; now a dissenter from the established Church of England is by some so-called."

Pomfrett's "Remains," published after his death, consist of two poems only—namely, "Reason," a satire, and "Dies Novissima; or, the Last Epiphany," a Pindaric ode.

"The first of them," says his editor, "entituled, 'Reason,' was wrote by him in the year 1700, when the debates concerning the doctrine of the Trinity were carried on with so much heat by the clergy one against another, that King William was obliged to interpose his Royal authority, by putting an end to that pernicious controversy, through an Act of Parliament, strictly forbidding any person whatsoever to publish their notions on the subject,"† This poem was published by Mr. Pomfrett at the time it was written, but he refrained from including it in his collected poems because he "received very signal favours from some of the persons mentioned therein." After the deaths of the poet and his friends the editor thought the objection removed. There appears to be some confusion here. Pomfrett's poems were published in 1699, though it is said "Reason" was not written till 1700, so we do not see how it could have been included: it is also said to have been found, after his death, among other of his papers of a private nature, and yet to have been published at the time it was written.

The passage referring to the theological controversies of the time is interesting enough to quote at length; it shows the liberal, if not latitudinarian temper of our poet:—

What's all the noisy jargon of the schools
But idle nonsense of laborious fools,
Who fetter Reason with perplexing rules?
What in Aquinas' bulky works are found,
Does not enlighten Reason, but confound.
Who travels Scotus' swelling tomes shall find
A cloud of darkness rising on the mind.
In controverted points can Reason sway,
When passion, or conceit, still hurries us away?
Thus his new notions Sherlock would instil
And clear the greatest mysteries of will;
But, by unlucky wit, perplexed them more,
And made them darker than they were before.
South soon oppos'd him, out of Christian zeal,
Showing how well he could dispute and rail.
How shall we e'er discover which is right,
When both so eagerly maintain the fight?
Each does the other's arguments deride;
Each has the Church and Scripture on his side.
The sharp ill-natured combat's but a jest:
Both may be wrong; one, perhaps, errs the least.
How shall we know which Articles are true,
The old ones of the Church, or Burnet's new?
In paths uncertain and unsafe he treads,
Who blindly follows other's fertile heads.
For sure, what certain mark have we to know,
The right or wrong, 'twixt Burgess, Wake, and Howe."

After some equally uncomplimentary reflections upon the medical profession, he returns to the difficulty of the search for truth, and concludes:—

But truth lies hid, and ere we can explore
The glitt'ring gem, our fleeting life is o'er.

I have left myself but little room to refer to "The Choice" by which Pomfrett is best remembered.

Dr. Johnson said of this poem that perhaps no composition in our language has been oftener perused: "He pleases many, and he who pleases many must have some species of merit."

The chief merit of the poem, in addition to its "easy volubility" and "smooth metre" (Johnson), is that it expresses the sentiments of the average man who has more culture than means, and whose benevolent instincts are kept in check by the scantiness of his purse.

The poet begins with a description of his ideal residence, its situation, garden, landscape, outdoor study, and the books which it should hold. He then goes on to his estate—i.e., his income.

I'd have a clear and competent estate
That I might live genteely, but not great:
As much as I could moderately spend;
A little more, sometimes, t' oblige a friend,
Nor should the Sons of Poverty repine
Too much at Fortune, they should taste of mine.

His table would display a frugal plenty, and his wine cellar should contain only the very best vintage, but he would allow no intemperate indulgence;

Nor would I use what was so kindly given,
To the dishonour of indulgent Heaven.

He would select two friends—

Well born, of humours suited to my own
Discreet, and men, as well as books have known.

After a catalogue of their virtues he passes on to a female companion:—

For there's a sweetness in a female mind,
Which in a man's we cannot hope to find.

We have a fascinating picture of the fair creature he would choose, and he then closes with his own ideal of himself:—

I'd be concerned in no litigious jar—
Belov'd by all, not vainly popular.
Whate'er assistance I had power to bring,
T' oblige my country, or to serve my king,
Whene'er they call, I'd readily afford
My tongue, my pen, my counsel, or my sword.
Lawsuits I'd shun, with as much studious care
As I would dens where hungry lions are;

* Spelt so by Cobbe.

† The Blasphemy Act, 1698.

And rather put up injuries than be
A plague to him, who'd be a plague to me.

He would like to live to a good old age (poor fellow, he died of small-pox at thirty-six), free from all anxiety.

But by a silent and a peaceful death
Without a sigh, resign my aged breath.
And when committed to the dust, I'd have Few tears, but friendly, dropt into my grave.
Then would my exit so propitious be,
All men would wish to live and die like me.

In addition to these two principal poems, Pomfrett wrote several religious ones; one upon the Divine Attributes is a philosophical essay in verse of some merit, others are more conventional; there are also the usual Epistles to Delia, Celadon, &c., and a pastoral elegy on the death of Queen Mary. From this little volume we may get a good idea of the life, sentiments, and aims of a country parson of two hundred years ago.

WALTER LLOYD.

THE UNITARIAN METHODISTS.—I.

AMONGST the minor religious movements of the century that have contributed something to the main stream of Unitarian thought and life, few are of equal interest to the rise and progress of the Unitarian Methodist Societies of Lancashire. These societies came into being through the influence of the Rev. Joseph Cooke (b. May 8, 1775; d. March 14, 1811). He was appointed head of the Rochdale circuit by the Wesleyan Methodists in 1803, and proved most acceptable as a preacher. His first differences with the Wesleyan body were about the doctrines of "Justification by Faith" and the "Witness of the Spirit," as taught by the Methodists at that time. It is recorded that in his travels on circuit he had met many who "talked as though they thought religion consisted principally in raptures and impressions. While these were saying 'the temple of the Lord are we,' those in whom godly sorrow had wrought true repentance and who had broken and contrite hearts, but who could not boast of these raptures and impressions, or what was called the witness of the Spirit, were represented as being in a most deplorable condition, as though the wrath of God abode upon them. Numbers of these pious souls were led to believe themselves in the deplorable condition in which they were represented to be and literally 'went mourning all their days.'"

Mr. Cooke, desirous to put a stop to what he regarded as a prevailing error, preached two sermons, one on "Justification by Faith," the other on "The Witness of the Spirit," in which he set forth what he felt to be the true grounds of justification and the sufficient witness of acceptance with God, according to the testimony of Scripture. The doctrine contained in these sermons was considered to be erroneous, and the Methodist Conference at Leeds, in August, 1806, suspended Mr. Cooke, telling him that he could not be considered a member of that body while he retained his present sentiments. His congregation, however, stood by him, and in 1807 they opened a place of worship for him, which they called "Providence Chapel." "This chapel," said Mr. Cooke the first time he preached in it, "was built and opened not for the purpose of teaching any system of doctrines taught by any man or number of men whatever, but for the purpose of communicating those truths which, after a diligent and impartial inquiry, may appear to me to be contained in the Scriptures."

Besides preaching at Rochdale, Mr. Cooke preached every fourth Sunday at Newchurch, in Rossendale (where about thirty people, led by a capable local preacher, John Ashworth, had severed their connection with the Methodists), and on the Monday and Tuesday following at Padiham and Burnley, with occasional services at Todmorden, Haslingden, and other places.

It was a great blow to the little community when Mr. Cooke, worn out by his arduous labours, was stricken with illness, and died in 1811. Following the old custom he was buried in the aisle, before his pulpit.

Up to this time those who had thus seceded from the Wesleyan Methodists had not come into contact with Unitarianism. "It was some years after this time," says John Ashworth, "before we knew anything of Unitarians or of Unitarian books except the Bible; what we read therefore in addition to the Bible were books published by Trinitarians." They considered and examined in turn the doctrine of "divine or irresistible influence," the nature of faith and repentance, the doctrines of Sanctification, Original Sin, and the Atonement. Upon these last two doctrines the friends at Newchurch seem to have gone further than some of those connected with Mr. Cooke's congregation at Providence Chapel, and this led to some differences.

After the death of their leader, the Rochdale congregation first approached the Rev. Thomas Finch, of Lynn, and invited him to succeed Mr. Cooke. Mr. Finch had seceded from the Baptists at King's Lynn, and advocated a purely Scriptural Christianity. He declined the invitation to Rochdale, and gathered a congregation in Lynn itself, the precursor of the present Unitarian cause in that town.* Then a Mr. Bowman, of Ipswich, who had been a local preacher amongst the Methodists, was secured, but he seems to have been used as a tool by the more orthodox section of the congregation, and "began to preach more orthodox discourses than some liked." The monthly exchange had hitherto been kept up with Newchurch, but now the more orthodox section at Rochdale raised objections to it, owing to John Ashworth's opinions in reference to Original Sin and the Atonement; and a trustees' meeting resolved that John Ashworth should not come to preach any more until such times that he preached "according to Mr. Cooke's printed works which are registered in the Trust Deed."

Four trustees and many of the people dissented from this action and left the chapel, about nineteen months after Mr. Cooke's death. Providence Chapel was then occupied for a short time by the Methodists, from whom it was bought by the Independent Calvinists. The "Cookeites," as they were called, were thus again without a place of meeting; but it is pleasant to recall the fact that they were allowed the use of the chapel in Blackwater-street, occupied by the old Protestant Dissenting congregation since 1717, till such time as they could find a convenient place for worship.* A suitable room was soon found, and here the "Cookeites" continued to meet, till a new chapel was opened in Clover-street, on Aug. 1, 1818. A loyal band of lay-preachers maintained the services in this congregation till 1862, when a regular paid ministry was begun.

Turning back to the question of doctrine, we find that, after careful discussion and examination of the Scripture, these earnest working folk were led to give up the orthodox doctrine of the Atonement—"that Christ died to reconcile his Father to us and to be a sacrifice not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men." They then passed on to consider the doctrine of the Trinity. Mr. Cooke had made no special reference to this doctrine in his preaching. He had struck out the term Trinity and altered the grosser Trinitarian phraseology in such Wesleyan hymns as he adopted for use amongst his own people, but that was to render them more scriptural, and in the opinion of John Ashworth, he held what are called Sabellian views on this subject. His followers, however, passed on to the Unitarian position which they frankly adopted on scriptural grounds. "It was from the Bible, but particularly from the common version of the New Testament, that we learned what we now believe." While the main body of Unitarians adhered to the doctrine of "philosophic necessity," these Unitarian Methodists of the North, like the General Baptists of the South, stuck to the doctrine of the "freedom of the will" and the "free agency of man"; "this," says Ashworth, "we always professed," and he gives the reasons that inclined him to believe it still. Those who have read the preface to Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory" will remember how he there recounts the steps by which he passed from the "necessarian" position to belief in the freedom of the will; steeped in the "empirical" and "necessarian" mode of thought, he "served out successive terms of willing captivity to Locke and Hartley, to Collins, Edwards, and Priestley, to Bentham and James Mill"; but the pleading of the moral consciousness was too strong for him, and he was ultimately led to the surrender of determinism. It was largely through Martineau—though, perhaps, in larger part through the work of Channing—that the main body of Unitarians were rescued from bondage to necessarian ideas; but we must not forget that there were at an earlier period some in our midst like these Unitarian Methodists who had a rational confidence in the pronouncements of their own nature, and not a few who followed Price in their philosophy rather than Priestley. The people at Padiham evidently kept up their interest in these deep questions. The Rev. John Robberds, telling of a visit paid

UNDER THE SOUTHERN CROSS.

SINCE my last letter to THE INQUIRER, many great and stirring events have occurred. We might well exclaim, "These are times that try men's souls!" Even at this distance from the centre of the Empire, our hearts have been deeply moved by the various incidents connected with the war. We have had our farewells to departing contingents, and we are already beginning the sadder task of unveiling memorial tablets to the men who have fallen.

I have, of course, read the letters and articles in THE INQUIRER and have felt regret at the, sometimes, bitter tone introduced. For myself, the desire for peace and the hatred of war win my sympathy and commendation, though I cannot agree with the Editor's view as to the responsibility of British statesmen. Much of the outcry against Mr. Chamberlain seems unjust, and much of the talk about Boer virtues little else than idle nonsense.

Still, those who take a different view are entitled to respect and consideration so long as their opinion is an honest one.

Here, in Sydney, I have tried to maintain a calm, though patriotic, attitude; and yet I fear that some of my friends, especially Germans and those with German connections, have felt annoyed because I failed to sympathise with that little tyrannical autocracy which our good old friend, Page Hopps, calls the "sturdy little Republic."

Surely we can agree to differ, and it would be not only sad but even discreditable if we allowed the war spirit to stir up strife or ill-feeling among our Liberal Churches.

At present, we in Sydney are engaged in another kind of warfare. An enemy has invaded our shores, and tremendous efforts are being put forth to drive it away or to stamp it out. The invader is the Bubonic Plague, which has apparently found a lodgment in and around our city. The cases, to date, number 151, and among these the deaths number 53.

Certain portions of the city, where most of the wharfs are situated, have been placed under quarantine restrictions and thousands of men engaged in a process of cleaning. From under the wharfs, filth which has been accumulating for years has been dredged and taken out to sea. Houses have been cleaned out, and dirty wooden structures pulled to pieces and burned in great bonfires in the streets. An almost inconceivable amount of rubbish and filth has been removed and carried out to the ocean—doubtless to the intense disgust of many of the fishes.

At first there was a terrible scare, and some patients died as much of fright as of plague. People are becoming more reasonable now, and are facing the difficulty and the danger with composure and courage. The actual danger for any single individual is, at present, very slight. As a matter of fact, there should be more alarm with regard to the spread of typhoid; and we are hoping that the measures adopted in order to get rid of the plague will indirectly benefit us by diminishing the number of typhoid cases.

Turning to the cause of the Liberal Churches, I believe that Auckland is already having reason to congratulate itself upon having the Rev. William Jellie, B.A., sent out as minister of the Unitarian Church in that city. Within the last week, I have been favoured with a letter from the secretary, conveying the unanimous resolution—

That the members of this church tender their most grateful thanks to the Rev. G. Walters for the sympathy and assistance rendered by him in the formation of our church.

It may seem egotistical to quote this, but I do so because it serves as a complete and practical answer to those who have insinuated that I tried to damage the distinctively "Unitarian" cause in order to promote the Australian Church idea.

But if my Auckland friends are thus grateful because of my visit in 1898, and because I have sent MS. sermons and lectures to be read by lay-members, I am really grateful to them for their good-fellowship, and because their little church seems to form a kind of connecting link with the many old co-workers in England and Scotland.

Mr. Jellie spent a day with me as he passed through Sydney on the way to his field of labour. It is pleasing to hear, from one of the most earnest of his people there, that during the first few weeks after his arrival the movement had been a much greater success than any of them had even dared to hope for.

Another of the brethren from "Home" has been round this way lately. One Sunday evening I detected a face in the congregation which had a familiar look, and after service the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of Liverpool, came and renewed an old acquaintance. During the service there had been a violent storm of rain, hail, lighting and thunder. For the first time in my experience I stopped my discourse and asked the congregation to sing a hymn, after which, the storm having diminished somewhat, the sermon was resumed.

At our half-yearly conversazione, on April 11, Mr. Lloyd Jones was present and delivered one of his cheery speeches. His advent amongst us was all the more delightful, because some of my relatives in Liverpool are among his helpers. We should have been glad if he could have taken one of our services, but his stay in Sydney was brief, and as the pulpit of the Hyde Park Church was vacant he very naturally and properly preached there, morning and evening.

Dr. Zillmann, after ministering for about eighteen months, has departed for England, en route for America.

Our "Australian" Churches, in Melbourne, Newcastle, Lucknow, and Sydney, are all "pegging away" and, let us hope, doing some good work. The recent severe summer has had its effect upon our cause in Sydney and upon the minister in particular. Congregations cannot be very large when the whole city is like a hot steam bath. The cooler weather having now arrived, we are beginning to revive. The congregations have already improved, and we are hoping soon to have our I.O.OF. Temple well filled on Sunday evenings, instead of the smaller attendance of not much over a couple of hundred.

The Saturday evening lecture entertainments in the School of Arts Hall have been started earlier this winter, and so far they have been decidedly successful. Dr. Ralph Hodgson and Colonel G. W. Bell, U.S. Consul, have been among the lecturers thus far.

Though the news may seem somewhat ancient by the time this reaches you, I may say that we had a memorial service on the Sunday following the receipt of the cablegram, announcing the "ascension" of Dr. Martineau. The Press, generally, paid very little attention to the loss sustained by the whole Religious World. One of the Adelaide dailies had a long article, strangely enough by the Rev. J. Page Hopps (copied, I suppose, from some English publication), and the Australian Christian World, edited by my friend, the Rev. Robert Day (Congregational), had more than one kindly reference. The Sydney Evening News interviewed me, and published a brief reference to Dr. Martineau's life and work. A remarkably fine sermon on the subject was preached by the Rev. R. H. Lambley, of Melbourne, and special discourses were also delivered by all our Australian Church ministers.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Bunsen's "Hippolytus and his Age."

No divine authority is given to any set of men to make truth for mankind. The supreme judge is the Spirit in the Church—that is to say, in the universal body of men professing Christ. The universal conscience is God's highest interpreter. If Christ speaks truth, his words must speak to the human reason and conscience, whenever and wherever they are preached: let them, therefore, be preached. If the Gospels contained inspired wisdom, they must themselves inspire with heavenly thoughts the conscientious inquirer and the serious thinker: let them, therefore, freely be made the object of inquiry and of thought. Scripture, to be believed true with full conviction, must be at one with reason: let it, therefore, be treated rationally. By taking this course, we shall not lose strength; but we shall gain a strength which no Church ever had. There is strength in Christian discipline, if freely accepted by those who are to submit to it; there is strength in spiritual authority, if freely acknowledged by those who care for Christ; there is strength unto death in the enthusiasm of an unenlightened people, if sincere, and connected with lofty moral ideas. But there is no strength to be compared with that of a faith which identifies moral and intellectual conviction with religious belief, with that of an authority instituted by such a faith, and of a Christian life based upon it, and striving to Christianise this world of ours, for which Christianity was proclaimed. Let those who are sincere, but timid, look into their conscience, and ask themselves whether their timidity proceeds from faith, or whether it does not rather betray a want of faith. Europe is in a critical state, politically, ecclesiastically, socially. Where is the power able to reclaim a world, which, if it be faithless, is become so under untenable and ineffective ordinances—which, if it is in a state of confusion, has become confused by those who have spiritually guided it? Armies may subdue liberty; but armies cannot conquer ideas: much less can Jesuits and Jesuitical principles restore religion, or superstition revive faith. I deny the prevalence of a destructive and irreligious spirit in the hearts of the immense majority of the people.

I believe that the world wants, not less, but more religion. But however this be, I am firmly convinced that God governs the world, and that He governs it by the eternal ideas of truth and justice engraved on our conscience and reason; and I am sure that nations, who have conquered, or are conquering, civil liberty for themselves, will sooner or later as certainly demand liberty of religious thought, and that those whose fathers have victoriously acquired religious liberty will not fail to demand civil and political liberty also. With these ideas, and with the present irresistible power of communicating ideas, what can save us except religion, and therefore Christianity? But then it must be a Christianity based upon that which is eternally God's own, and is as indestructible and as invincible as He is Himself: it must be based upon Reason and Conscience, I mean reason spontaneously embracing the faith in Christ, and Christian faith feeling itself at one with reason and with the history of the world. Civilised Europe, as it is at present, will fall; or it will be pacified by this liberty, this reason, this faith.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Little Steps to Greatest Wisdom.

DID you see the eclipse of the sun on May 28? There seemed to be a little bite taken out of the sun, and that little dark part was the moon coming between us and the sun. Does it not seem wonderful that people on our earth should be able to reckon and know exactly to a second when this would happen, and then look out for it and find it there? It is just as wonderful, too, that they can reckon the exact moment when the sun will rise or set every day, and when the moon will be new, or crescent or gibbous; when the planets will rise and set, and when we may expect a visit from a comet. How clever men were to invent telescopes, which help them to see all these things! Through the telescope we can see mountains in the moon, with deep shadows cast from them by the sun's light; and there seem to be craters of volcanoes in them too. We can see Jupiter, and the astronomers have found out that Jupiter is as large as 1,200 of our earth, and that it is always moving through space and flying round the sun—how fast do you think?—at the rate 700,000 miles a day; and as Jupiter travels thus, four moons go with him and circle round him. We can see Venus too, who is like the moon in having "phases"; that is, she passes from crescent to full, and then to gibbous and then vanishes, till the crescent shows again. Then we can see Saturn with his rings all round, like the edge of a dish, or a rim of a hat, and with eight moons moving round him, some large and some small. I wonder what it would be like to have eight moons?

There was an astronomer who was born in the year 1571, and lived mostly in Germany. He gave his life to studying the stars—sitting up at nights when other people were sound asleep in their beds and not thinking of the stars at all—and tried to learn their movements, through his telescope, and how large they were, and how far off, and whether they had any air round them as our earth has, so that people could live on them, and many other things. Can you not fancy his awe and wonder as more and more of these glories grew upon him? And then he exclaimed: "O God, I think Thy thoughts after Thee." This was John Kepler. And what a splendid thought it is that all that we can find out or learn is there—thought of and planned before our thought began; the thought of God waiting for our thought to reach it and find it out. All things are thought out, and put in order, and we begin at the beginning and follow step by step, and one thing after another opens before us, till we feel like Kepler in awe at the thought of God which he read. In all discoveries men do not invent anything; all that they do is to follow and find out what the thought of God has already made. "How could He think of it all?" a friend once said, as we walked amongst all the loveliness of the country.

Think of some of the greatest "discoveries" that have been made by men—besides those about sun, moon, and stars; think of the use of steam, which takes us hundreds of miles by land or sea; think of electricity, which carries our messages by telegraph in a few seconds, or lights our streets and rooms with brilliancy; think of the thermometer, which tells us the heat or the cold; of the microscope that gives our eyes power to see things of which we could else not dream; think that men have been able to discover how fast light travels—more than 186,000 miles in a second of time—and by that are able to calculate how far off the sun is, or the moon, or stars: and yet in all these things the thought of God had put them there, and they had existed for ages, before men, with care and pains and earnest thought, had tried to work their way to learn them and discover them. As Job said, "Lo these are a part of his ways, but how little a portion is heard of him."

When Nansen went to the Polar regions, and to parts where no man had ever been before him, with endless wastes of snow and ice, was it not God who was there ages before Nansen went, and had spread the "eternal snows" over which he drove his sledges drawn by his faithful dogs? And that North Pole which he wished to discover, it was there all the time—a thought of God's which he tried to reach. And it was another great discovery by which he made his way over the trackless snow, and amongst the bears and walruses, seals and whales; it was by the compass, whose needle points always to the North.

And how do people ever come to find out all these wonderful things?

Well, children, I have heard some of you complain that you hate lessons, that they are "dull" and "stupid," and that you wish you need not learn them. But wait a minute. If Kepler had never learnt twice two are four, or three from five leaves two, or six sixes are thirty-six, he would never have been able to find out anything about the sun, moon and stars!

But you think "that is only babies' work." Yes, but we all have to begin as babies; we cannot walk before we can stand, and in order to climb three steps we must climb one first. Now all the great and wonderful calculations, as to eclipses of the sun and moon and the movements of them, and of the earth and stars, are made by means of the mathematics of which those baby sums are the beginning. The arithmetic, geometry, and algebra which, as you grow older, you learn by degrees, are the very same laws and rules which, if followed out, will lead to these great discoveries. Does not that thought make you feel that, after all, it is a good thing to learn? and that such lessons cannot be really dull or stupid if we put our minds into them?

Well, but supposing you do care for sums, geometry, and algebra—someone says, "why should we learn geography and history?"

Well, how would Nansen have done without geography, or the explorers in Africa, such as Livingstone and the other travellers whose adventures we read of? And how could we ever read their travels with any understanding if we did not know some geography? And are not all the lands the thought of God, as well as the sun and stars, and in learning about these lands do we not learn to think those thoughts after Him? And as to history, that is learning about the people whom God has put into those lands, and how the many nations of the earth have lived their lives and managed their affairs, and how they have been led on and on till they have grown more and more civilised, and learnt more and more from all the hidden things that are given them to discover. "But Latin and Greek, and such things, what of them?" These are the forms in which those great nations expressed their thoughts; and besides being able to read the fine things that were written in these languages in old times, such as Virgil, Horace, and Homer wrote, the languages themselves are full of beauty and interest; and a great many words of our own come from Latin or Greek; and we can trace families in the languages, through likenesses in words or expressions, if we study them sufficiently.

I went to Athens once, and I was so glad then that I had learnt a little Greek; for though it was very little, and the modern Greek is very different in some ways from the ancient, it was very nice when we saw Greek names over the shops, and notices of what was to be sold and names of streets put up on the houses, to be able to read them and understand just a little of what they meant. It seemed to make Greek a living thing to me.

There is nothing that we can learn that is not a step up towards something great; and if we only think that all our studies and discoveries are, as Kepler said, thinking God's thoughts after him, even our little baby lessons become great, and all the harder things that we try to learn as we grow older and older seem to light up more and more with a light that shines from those "thoughts of God" which He leads us to think after Him.

"O let us praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men. O Lord, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast Thou made them all: the earth is full of Thy riches!"

ENOUGH AND TO SPARE.

DR. BARNES, of M'Gill University, Montreal, and son of the Unitarian minister in that city, is in this country for a short visit connected with his studies as a physicist. He has met with special success, we understand, in discovering stores of heat, hitherto undemonstrated if suspected, hidden away among the secrets of so common a thing as water. We have, indeed, been prepared during two long generations of physical research for revelations of the kind, and have been led to expect that, when the proper keys have been applied, men will find themselves enriched by resources of energy which will as far transcend the potencies of steam as these exceeded the muscular labours of primitive slaves. Not that we expect "something to arise out of nothing," as MICHAEL FARADAY put it, but what we may rightfully expect is that out of the "something" which surrounds us every day there may arise the greater wonders, the fuller inheritance of human skill, the ampler provision for human blessedness. When Professor BOSE, of Calcutta, a few years ago, brought from the East a tribute to science similar to that which now comes from the West, he was able to show us that the so-called "X-rays" were typical of many rays, and that a series of algebraic symbols of other unknown quantities might be appropriately called in. It was impossible, as we watched his skilful demonstrations, to resist the conviction that the unsuspected allies of humanity, pulsing unseen in their own proper order and rhythm through the universal "force," are not only far more numerous than men have as yet conceived, but that their services are destined to be greater than we have ever dared to hope.

If that be so, or if we may reasonably cherish the thought and be strengthened in our expectations of greater things in the physical world as one investigator after another turns from his laboratory with some new discovery to announce, it is surely not unreasonable, but eminently sane and indeed inevitable, to look confidently for fresh stores of mental and spiritual energy. We want them. If ever there were evil days, since those that MILTON fell on, they would seem to be around us now. Men have seen wars and heard rumours of wars before; there has not seldom been famine on the earth; and the dark shadow of dire want and degradation has long dogged the heels of civilisation. But never has the present generation in this country seen so dark an outlook—if only men would look out and see! We do not want to discuss the South African war again. Liberavimus animam nostram; the heavy account grows wearily heavier month by month, and men's hearts grow heavier with it—even the hearts of many who in a small way imitated the famous French statesman who led his people with a light heart into the disasters of 1870. The news from China is everywhere recognised as of the most ominous kind for Europe at large; and our own private troubles as a nation are increased by the outbreak in Ashanti. There have been Indian famines before; but Lord CURZON is our witness that the present one is unprecedented in the times of British rule. What a load is this for our people to bear! But the worst feature of these evil days is that more terrible dearth that the prophet speaks of, "not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord." When, we ask ourselves, was our country so destitute of great voices lifted up in fearless remonstrance against the greed, the tyranny, the vengefulness that reign supreme? Let us rather say, when was there before a determination so clear and a power so deadly of stifling, as far as possible, in the Press any voice that does attempt to speak against the drift of popular opinion? But this newspaper boycott is but one symptom of the widespread evil. "My people love to have it so," is the newspaper-proprietor's sufficient plea; let us sorrowfully add, "And what will they do in the end thereof?"

We could but too easily bring evidence that these bad times are bad for all sorts of good causes. There is the less need of bringing forward such evidence here because the majority of those who will read these lines are already face to face with it. They know the slackness that has set in with regard to matters philanthropical, the difficulty of rousing enthusiasm for fresh ventures demanding faith and a good heart. It is much if with all their efforts they can keep their good work just going on. The flush of Midsummer fulness painfully surprises them in their scanty measures of life, and they may well be "faint" while still they "pursue." But they will "pursue." The faithful are, after all, just they who are on the way to set free the hidden energies that make for righteousness. They do not expect "something from nothing." There is something, the greatest, most certain source of energy, close at hand. Little suspected, or, where intellectually confessed, too often practically ignored, there is a life-force which surrounds us, ready to beat like a mighty tide through every channel we open for it, and ready in ways the most various to contribute to the good of man and to lead on to the consummation of the heavenly kingdom—eternal wisdom embodied in a glorious creation. It was thither that the men whom we call saints and heroes pressed when in their day the need for help and indomitable energy was sorest. Thither, in ways not more occult than the physicist's—in ways of truth, and fidelity, and implicit trust—they went whose words live on because they were not their own but His who sent them. Thither, not in ways remote and strange, but in the common life of common men, he went who so found "the Father" that all who follow in his steps come with him at last into the soul's utmost fulness of power and abundance of peace. We name that Father GOD, and bow the head. We meditate on His secret, and learn that "all things are ours" when we are His. "Go your way straight to GOD's work," said that noble woman, FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE, who in her own person became a channel for mighty energies to well forth upon a stricken world—"Go your way straight to GOD's work in simplicity and singleness of heart." Never till the soul does His work does it know how strong it is.

THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS AT DARJEELING, BENGAL.—The Indian Messenger of May 20 reports :—"The visit of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams to Darjeeling has stirred up new life. The sermons he is now preaching every Sunday in the local Brahmo Mandir have met with warm appreciation. Recently he delivered a lecture on 'Charles Dickens' in the Lowis Jubilee Sanitarium Hall. Mr. Williams has gone there for rest after his fatiguing journey in the South; but in compliance with the wishes of his Brahmo friends, who are assembled in large numbers at that hill station, he is denying himself of that rest. We fear his stay at Darjeeling will not be one of rest and refreshment, but of hard work. We admire his great devotion to the work for which he has come out to this country."

IMPRESSIONS OF UNITARIANISM IN AMERICA.

It is not much that one can see and learn in a country so vast as the United States in a visit extending only over a few weeks, and, when Canada is also included in the journey, it will be evident that impressions gathered in such haste must be very imperfect, and any attempt to form or pass judgments upon them would be absurd. There are some things, however, which one cannot go wrong over, and those are the feelings of personal enjoyment and interest experienced during the time spent in a far-away land. Thanks to the courtesy and good offices of Mr. Sunderland, of Highgate, and of Mr. Eliot, of the American Unitarian Association, my path was prepared for me, and I found friends, guides, and philosophers all along the way ready to help, direct, and inform me.

In order that I might see something of Unitarians and their work in different parts of America, the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association desired me to make a tour of a portion of the country before proceeding to the meetings at Boston, to which, along with Mr. Hargrove, I had been appointed a delegate. This enabled me to visit Philadelphia, where Mr. May invited a few neighbouring ministers and leading laymen to meet me at his hospitable home, and where I had an opportunity of learning something of the good work which has been accomplished in that city. The names of Benjamin Franklin and Joseph Priestley are still linked with the progressive life and thought of Philadelphia and with the Unitarian cause there. At Baltimore, where the minister, Mr. Geohegan, and Judge Morris showed me all round, it was a great delight to visit the church made famous in the annals of Unitarian history by Dr. Channing's great sermon preached there in 1819 on the installation of Jared Sparks. Washington is the most beautiful city I visited, and at the end of April, when I was there, the flowers, the grass, and the trees were aglow with the freshness of what to me seemed an early summer. Mr. Barrows, formerly editor of the Christian Register, took me to the White House, Congress, the Senate, the Library, Arlington Cemetery, and all about town. The Unitarian Church occupies a central position, and there is a large and influential congregation. I was greatly interested in the Sunday-school and in the various classes which I found at the church. Professor Craven conducted an adult class in the study of Comparative Religion, and Colonel Whitman held a Unity Study Class for men and women, at which the fundamental principles of religious thought and life were considered. I was glad to find from the report that quite a number of professional men, and several leading statesmen, were connected with the church at Washington.

From the capital I returned to New York, where previously I had met Mr. Morehouse and Mr. Merle Wright, and had seen a little of the Unitarian Church buildings, and had heard something of the good work of the band of able and devoted men who occupy the pulpits in New York and Brooklyn. Chadwick, Collyer, Savage, Slicer, and Wright, make up as brilliant and varied a set of ministers as one could find in any denomination or in any large city. From New York to Cleveland, calling at Buffalo and visiting Niagara on the way, is a far cry to one accustomed to railway distances in England. At Cleveland, Mr. Simons, only recently settled there, is evidently making his influence felt. There is a great and growing community for Unitarian work, and I was delighted to discover among the people whom I met at a congregational supper a spirit of genuine earnestness and hopefulness. The church parlour, and the appliances and accommodation for social gatherings, are characteristic features in connection with the Cleveland Church, as with other Unitarian Churches which I visited in America.

On reaching Chicago, I rejoined Mr. and Miss Pritchard, with whom I had sailed in the Ivernia from Liverpool to New York. We were all three at the great city, which forms a kind of entrance to the West, that we might see something of the Unitarian Church and School work there. Mr. Southworth, Mr. Backus, and Mr. Fenn gave us all some preaching and talking to do, and our time was fully occupied. The actual attendances at the churches in Chicago are small compared with the possible attendances in so vast a city. Unitarian work is hard and uphill, but I gathered that a revival of enthusiasm and interest had recently set in, and hopes were expressed that in the near future the churches would have a more cheerful story to tell. Mr. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, with whom I spent a pleasant hour, has a big church building plan in his head and on paper, and he looks forward to putting the plan into a solid stone structure before many years are over. Mr. Jones is a very good Unitarian, but he believes that another descriptive name or title might be coined which would prove more attractive to a section of the world which is waiting, he thinks, for something bigger than the Unitarian has to offer, a section which is, perhaps, too indolent or indifferent as yet to do much by way of creating or organising a movement suited to its own aspirations and needs. If Mr. Jones can make a net capable of catching and holding these people, he would be a very bigoted Unitarian who would not rejoice at his success. Meanwhile, the Unitarians of Chicago are going to do their level best to make their thought and life and work as large and generous and progressive as they know how. The Unitarian Club arranged a dinner in honour of the English visitors, and a right good time we had, under the presidency of Professor Clark, of the University of Chicago. The Sunday School Union held a Conference on another evening, at which Miss Pritchard discoursed on books and how to use and study them in connection with the work which the parent and the teacher are called upon to perform in the home and the Sunday-school. The address was preceded by a supper and followed by a discussion.

On leaving Chicago, I made my way to Ann Arbor, Michigan, where I was the guest of Mr. Crooker. The Unitarian Church, formerly ministered to by Mr. Sunderland, occupies a prominent position in this charming University town. Judge Harman, whom I had met in London, took me over the University buildings and introduced me to professors and students; and in the afternoon I had an opportunity of watching the game of baseball, played by students of Chicago and Ann Arbor Universities, when I heard, for the first time, the far-famed "yells" of the respective colleges. Detroit was my next stopping place, a large and fine city with an air of comfort and refinement as well as of stability about it. My stay was very brief, and was chiefly made in order to see Mrs. Sunderland and her family with whom I spent an evening.

Toronto, one of the chief cities of Canada, has not yet proved a strong recruiting ground for Unitarians, but Mr. Hawes, the present minister, is working with mind and heart to make the influence of liberal religious thought felt in the life of the community; and, judging from the number of men and women, old and young, whom I met at the church, there is a congregation at Toronto who mean to hold and work together, and who are determined to support their minister in every possible way. At Ottawa, the capital of Canada, the Unitarian cause is still in its infancy, but under Mr. Walkley's assiduous care it promises to grow before long into a sturdy manhood. The Sunday services are held in a hired hall; but a new church, in an excellent position, is in course of erection. There were large congregations at the services the Sunday I was there, and I was impressed by the zeal of the more active members. The serious loss caused by the devastating fire, which left behind it scenes of ruin, the like of which I had never witnessed before, will stand in the way of raising as much money locally for the church building as Mr. Walkley expected, and it is to be hoped that friends from a distance will come forward and render some assistance. The Unitarian pamphlets issued by the B. and F.U.A. were in evidence on the occasion of my visit, and they were eagerly sought by those who attended the services. In Ottawa, as in other parts of Canada that I visited, there is a very strong feeling of attachment to the mother-country. At Montreal, I had as my guide and friend Mr. Barnes, the minister of the church, who for many years has worked there very hard and pretty much alone. The Unitarian Church is a fine building, and at one time its position was very central. It is now, however, too far away from the residences of the people most likely to attend Unitarian services. The Sunday-school room, with its "Sunbeam," "Channing," "Martineau," and other classes, each with its name and motto, and each with its neat chairs or seats and little table, struck me as a very excellent and thoughtful arrangement for a Sunday-school. From Montreal I made my way to Manchester, New Hampshire, where I met Mr. Staples and saw the Unitarian Church, and learned something of the congregation and its position and work. Manchester is an important manufacturing centre, possessing some of the largest cotton mills in the United States, and yet the town itself is attractive and clean, with a plentiful growth of flowers and trees, and with beautiful hills and valleys and a fine lake close by. The Unitarian congregation has among its members several of the strong, active, leading citizens of Manchester.

Of my visit to Boston and its Unitarian meetings there, I must write next week.

WORDS OF COUNSEL.

THE address delivered by Mr. Hodgson Pratt as President of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, at the recent thirty-seventh annual meeting, contained much that is of interest to many beyond the immediate circle of the Union, and we are glad to be able to reproduce the following passages.

Having expressed the conviction that clubs have great opportunities of influence in the sphere of social and political reform, which they have not yet used to the full, Mr. Pratt continued:—

"The world is full of evil and misery arising from causes which can be remedied if there is only the will and the knowledge necessary. Even in this advanced and civilised nation there are to be found at any moment tens of thousands of human lives, hopeless and wasted; many wrongs, much cruelty and injustice, despair and fear. I have firmly believed all my life that the remedy for these things may be found, that these evils arise, in the long run, rather from moral than from material causes. When we have created in our community a higher sense of morality, a keener thirst for justice, and more unselfish devotion to the public good, half the battle will be won. If I have learnt anything since my youth it is that indolence, indifference, half-heartedness are the chief reasons why our legislation, our schools, our churches, and our numerous associations have not rendered greater and more rapid results.

"To accomplish these high claims we must, above all, break down the social barriers which divide men from each other, and it was one great purpose of the noblest man ever seen on this earth to break down these barriers. No founder of any other religion ever taught and practised so thoroughly as Jesus Christ the essential fraternity of man, the mischief and the misery which comes from the separation between rich and poor. In contradistinction to all others who bade men regard God as their Father, he taught that only by 'loving one's neighbour as oneself' could we rightly come to understand that God is Love, and that through that principle alone the misery of this world can be removed.

"A human life is a sacred possession. It matters not whether it is that of a costermonger or a prince. Every human life is a history of pain and joy, of moral gain or loss, of progress or stagnation, of success or failure. It may be a source of advantage or of disadvantage, of happiness or of misery, not only to its possessor, but to those other lives with which it comes in contact. Those lives are of father and mother, of brother and sister, of wife and children, of fellow citizens, of fellow workmen, or of fellow club members. At every point, in almost every day of our existence, we come in contact, for good or evil, with some friend or companion. The success of life, or its failure, its happiness or its misery, depend almost wholly upon the nature and character of our relations with each other. How far those relations are satisfactory or unsatisfactory is, therefore, one of the greatest problems of existence. The result must depend in the main on the individual himself. Our characters, our strength, and our weakness, are, of course, greatly affected by our surroundings and by the qualities we inherit, but no man is wholly the result of these latter. The great majority of us are endowed with an individual will which ultimately decides what we are. To a great extent our lives are in our own hands, so far as our character and conduct are concerned. The wisest and best men may be unsuccessful so far as material circumstances are concerned. The worst men, those who are guided by no normal principle, or who have stifled the voice of conscience, may become what is called 'successful'; but many of the unsuccessful men enjoy happiness to the last, are content and tranquil, upheld by firm faith in goodness and in the consciousness that they have been faithful to a noble ideal. On the other hand, the selfish, the unprincipled, and the unconscientious are not happy. That is the universal experience of all ages and countries, and the fact arises out of the innate constitution of human nature. The rascal may have periods of passionate triumph, and may attain many of the low ideals which he has followed, but, as a rule, the man is more disposed, as days pass away, to wish he had never been born, whatever his so-called 'success' may be. Depend upon it, my friends, that the moral laws which affect the daily life of man in his relation to his fellows, are as certain and as eternal as the laws which regulate the sunrise and sunset, the circulation of the blood in our bodies, and the whole existence of the earth on which we live. Do any of us sufficiently consider, as regards our relations with our fellow men, how much each of us is responsible for the influence that we exercise over others? Does the father consider how much, by every word, and look, and act, he tends to make his son's life a blessing or a curse? Does he in his relations with his friends and acquaintances individually, or as a member of a society or club, habitually consider how he may affect their welfare by his conversation and conduct? All this is especially true of the societies we call clubs. Night after night, week after week, a man is talking with fellow members; is he, or are they, the better or the worse for the talk? Does it make him or them better able to bear the heavy burdens of life, or make him or them nobler as men, purer, wiser, more useful citizens, and members of the State? That surely is a very serious consideration for each of us. When I say this, I am not thinking of workmen only. I am stating a general principle applicable to all human beings. Few of us sufficiently bear in mind the tremendous responsibility we incur toward our fellows often by even our most casual remarks in the course of conversation. This is especially true when we are in the society of those who are younger than ourselves. Through my whole life I have been influenced by words or acts unconsciously spoken or done before I was two or three and twenty years of age. When quite a boy, I once passed a night in the house of a relative, and after I had fallen asleep, a grown man, the captain of a merchantman, came in to occupy the same room. I did not know who he was, and I awoke at hearing him pray before he got into bed. It seems a trifling thing to mention, but it remained a vivid remembrance all my life, and, therefore, doubtless had an influence. I never saw him afterwards. Curiously enough, some years later, when I was about twenty, living in London away from home, I occasionally met the brother of the man just mentioned. Whenever I did, he said something, apparently without intention, which strengthened me during that difficult period of life, and to-day I recollect some of the things he said as clearly as if they were spoken yesterday. Now if he had been—like many—frivolous or unprincipled, I should have probably heard remarks which would perhaps have left an evil impression instead of a good one. We are all more or less like photographic plates. How different would the world be if the plates only received bright impressions of beauty and goodness instead of those which stain and injure the conscience."

Having spoken further of various matters affecting the special interests of Club life, Mr. Pratt dealt with the growth of the military spirit, and the suggested need for conscription, and then proceeded:—

"It is not in the increase of armaments that national security and prosperity is to be sought, but in the adoption of a foreign and colonial policy which is based on a due consideration of the rights of other peoples, whether civilised or uncivilised, on a policy of justice and conciliation.

"I look to the working classes of this country, in conjunction with a large part of the middle class, to return to the policy of Cobden and Bright, and to resist every attempt of the military and aristocracy to endanger the future of this free country and to launch it upon a policy of war and defiance.

"Note this. Last year all the civilised States declared that their peoples were threatened with absolute ruin by their military and naval expenditure. They further declared that international disputes ought in future to be settled by a Court of Justice instead of by war, and they laid the foundations of that Court.

"Herein is to be found a charter for the deliverance of the peoples from the curse of organised murder, and from the horrible cruelty and injustice which has enslaved nations. Herein lies the hope of realising the great promise of the reign of peace in the world. It is for the working men of the world to see to it that they are not robbed of the unspeakable blessing offered at the Hague. Let them be true to their dearest interests, to the cause of justice, humanity and righteousness. They must compel their Governments to fulfil the grandest promise of centuries, that made to them in July, 1899.

"England in the past has been ever cited by the lovers of justice and freedom as a great model nation. It is for the people of this country, and especially for the most numerous class of citizens, to uphold that good name which has been earned through so many struggles. Cherish the highest ideals for England. Never let her people suppose that the greatness of a nation, or its true influence in the world, depend upon the extent of its territory, or its foreign possessions, upon the strength of its army or navy. We were quite as great in influence for good, we had quite as much honour and esteem fifty years ago as we have to-day, and spend so much more money on armies and fleets than we did then. The true safety, as well as the true greatness of a people, depends upon its character in the world for just dealing towards other nations, for its loyalty to every promise and engagement which it makes, for the equity of its laws and institutions. No nation in the end ever held its place in the world by mere material strength: the decay of every State began from the moment that its policy was tainted by wrong and oppression, by greed or falsehood; let us take warning before it becomes too late. Our greatness in the past grew up while we were surrounded with nations having military forces far superior to our own, and why? Because we were everywhere trusted, and because the honour and good faith of Englishmen was a proverb. Let it continue to be so! Apart from your home duties and your duties to the cause of Labour, you can engage in no higher task than in maintaining the character of Great Britain as a righteous and God-fearing nation."

NOTES FROM DARJEELING.—I.

Darjeeling, May 16, 1900.

DARJEELING is the sanatorium of Bengal. Indeed, this Himalayan hill station draws invalids from all parts of India, and sends many of them home again with a new lease of life. "Globe-trotters" visit the district as a shore-place, and appreciate its bracing climate. From April to September it is the headquarters of the Bengal Government, and here gentlemen of the Civil Service refresh their wearied brains and ease their burdened life with a round of sports, amusements, and entertainments. Children and young people thrive here. European boarding-schools flourish. A high-class education on English lines induces parents to send their sons and daughters to Darjeeling, where the conditions of health are equal to those of England. This health resort is a paradise for children. Dr. Hooker, in his "Himalayan Journals," laid down a proposition which I will not contest, that children's faces afford a good index to the healthfulness of a climate. Certainly in no part of the world have I seen a more active, rosy, and bright young community than at Darjeeling. Dr. Hooker said: "It is incredible what a few weeks of that mountain air will do for the Indian-born children of European parents; they are taken there sickly, pallid or yellow, soft and flabby, to become transformed into models of rude health and energy."

You reach Darjeeling from Calcutta by twenty-two hours' travelling. In that time you ascend from sea-level to cloud-land. The total distance traversed is 379 miles. The actual perpendicular height gained is 7,400 feet, or nearly 1½ miles. The first part of the railway journey is uninteresting. You speed through a monotonous country, level as a billiard table, where rice is the staple production. This vast plain, however, is not without its beauties. Occasional clumps of palm and other trees, with most likely a native bustee or hamlet peeping out from their midst, break the view. In about four hours you are at Damukdia Ghât. Here you cross the Ganges in a steamer, the river being at this point from 2½ to 3 miles broad, and the current powerful. Arrived at Sara Ghât you again enter the railway. Night is now upon you, and during the hours of darkness you pass through the great jute producing district of Bengal. In the morning you are at Siliguri, where the southern spurs of the Himalayan range are in view. They tower aloft, tree-clad to the summits, and furrowed with sinuous river gorges, among which that of the Teesta is plainly distinguishable.

At Siliguri begins the Darjeeling-Himalayan—toy—Railway, described by authorities as "one of the marvels of engineering work throughout the world." As you look at the train it strikes you at first sight as Liliputian, and it seems incredible that the tiny little engine will ever drag its load up to the summit of the mountains towering overhead. However, the sturdy piece of mechanism, built in Glasgow, gives proof of its capabilities, as it skims along the seven miles of level tract known as the Terai. This is low-lying, swampy ground, a breeding place of malarious fever, but much improved of late years by the laying out of well-drained tea-gardens. Soon after leaving Siliguri the Mahanadi river is crossed. Tea plantations are passed to right and left of the railway, and the bungalows of the planters form a pretty feature of the scene. Seven miles to the north of Siliguri the Himalayas rise abruptly from the plains, clothed in forest from their base. The incline now becomes sudden and steep. The "track," to borrow an American term, begins to wind about and double and zigzag in a manner that is bewildering and amazing. No words can adequately describe the first sensation of travelling by this railway. The little engine pants and puffs, and the carriages wind after it round the sickle-shaped curves like a sinuous serpent. Now the engine is to the right of you; a moment afterwards it is to the left of you. Onwards and upwards you mount. At times you can see the track hundreds of feet beneath you, and you wonder how you ever got from that point to this. Now and then the train darts under a bridge; and a minute afterwards, describing an almost perfect circle, crosses over it. When a spur is reached that forbids the possibility of a curve, the figure Z is described, the train running along a siding, and the engine, after a momentary halt, backing the carriages up the central bar of the figure. The operation takes about two minutes, and then the train is speeding along again, parallel to the old track, but twenty or thirty feet higher up the mountain side. But all this must be seen for its marvellous ingenuity to be appreciated.

Meanwhile, you are struck with admiration for the superbly magnificent scenery above, around, and beneath you. The spectacle is grand beyond description. Lofty peaks tower overhead, usually with fleecy clouds dotting out the green with white. Here and there some taller summit quite disappears into cloud-land. To right and left of you level, dense deep-green forests everywhere meet the eye. They clothe continuously the steep slopes. Ever and anon they dip into some gorge, down which rushes an impetuous stream, a cascade, perhaps, with an overhanging cloud of spray adding to the beauty of the spectacle. Away below lies the vast plain, stretching like a great sea as far as the eye can reach, with spurs of lofty mountains forming a serrated edge, and the innumerable rivulets from the hills uniting into streams whose devious courses glisten like silver threads. A mighty and glorious panorama, which, once seen, can never fade from the memory.

To enter into a little detail. After passing Sookna, between seven and eight miles distant from Siliguri, the jungle grows denser and denser, and the ear-piercing chirrup of the cicada is heard. The Forest Department Depôt is passed, and elephants may be seen standing about after their labours in the forest. The sāl, toon, and other numerous timber trees bear thick and magnificent foliage. The graceful creepers and orchids pendant from the trees, the impenetrable jungle grass and varied undergrowth, produce a splendid picture of tropical vegetation. Shortly after the ninth mile a fine view opens to the south, and displays a vast horizon. Thence you pass on amid tropical scenery of great beauty. The timber becomes more gigantic, and is festooned by climbing leguminosæ, which sometimes sheath the trunks or span the forest with huge cables, binding tree to tree. Their trunks are also clothed with orchids, climbing pothos, peppers, vines, convolvulus, and bignonias. The beauty of the drapery of the pothos-leaves is pre-eminent, whether for the graceful folds the foliage assumes, or for the liveliness of its colour. Among the smaller trees the wild banana is conspicuous and abundant; and its crown of very beautiful foliage contrasts with the smaller-leaved plants amongst which it nestles. Next comes the screw-pine with a straight stem and a tuft of leaves, each eight or ten feet long, waving on all sides. The giant bamboo abounds everywhere; its dense tufts of culms, 100 feet and upwards high, are as thick at the base as a man's thigh. Various species of ferns, luxuriant and handsome, are seen, including a fern-tree. Beyond Rungtong Station the golden fern may be seen in its native habitat. Traces of coal may also be observed cropping out from amid the luxuriant verdure of the hillsides.

Proceeding in a northerly direction grand views are obtained of the valley below, the Bhootan range to the eastward, and the adjacent hills and valleys dotted with tea cultivation. In the plains to the south-east may be seen the Teesta River with "Tiger Island" clearly conspicuous. Passing onwards from Teendaria you note to the north-east a prominent mountain across the valley. This is the Sitong Hill, 5,574 feet above sea-level. On the ridge above Gyabari Station may be seen several Lepcha monuments. These are erected in many places as memorials of native chiefs and persons of note. At about the thirtieth mile the rocks are very bluff. There is a large projecting rock known as "Artilleryman's Rock," owing to an unfortunate man having committed suicide on the spot. At this point, above the road, is "Gladstone's Rock," so called on account of its supposed resemblance to that statesman.

Now we are on the ridge of the mountain to Kurseong, nearly 5,000 feet above sea-level. Here there is a complete change in the flora. Here now the birch and maple trees are found. Here also one notes a wild profusion of plants, reminding one of the temperate climate of England — the violet, stellaria, arum, viccinium, wild strawberry, and geranium. Mosses and lichens carpet the roadsides and banks. The birds and insects are different from those below. The wind blows colder. Everything proclaims a marked change in climatic conditions. The change from the clammy atmosphere of Bengal is complete. Mingled with the English-like flowers are tree-ferns, pothos, bananas, palms, figs, peppers, numbers of orchids, and similar genuine tropical genera. The uniform temperature and humidity of the climate favour the extension of tropical plant life into a temperate region. This mixture of temperate and tropical vegetation continues for 2,000 feet above Kurseong.

The views from Kurseong are exceedingly fine. Across the valley to the west may be seen the mountains of Nepaul, and the frontier fort of Elam. The plains lie to the south. To the north the hills are distinct, and on the clear day on which I travelled I caught, while waiting at Kurseong, my first glimpse of "the snows"—the highest point seen being Kinchinjinga. You resume the journey through the most magnificent scenery. The forest-clad valleys beneath the railway descend thousands of feet, the slope at times being almost precipitous. As I have said, I was fortunate on the route in having in view, in the clear atmosphere, the snowy range of the Himalayas; and this first sight of them, with clear cut peaks of dazzling white, towering in silent stupendous majesty into the sky, created a profound impression. The train presently pulls up at Ghoom Station, 7,407 feet above sea-level, the most elevated railway station in the Old World. Thence you descend about 600 feet, and presently the hillside to the north-east is seen covered with houses. This is the town of Darjeeling.

In the ascent from Kurseong you zigzag along the face of mountains clothed with magnificent forests of chestnut, walnut, oaks, and laurels. With Dr. Hooker's vivid description of this glorious wealth of plant-life I will conclude the present instalment of Notes. "It is difficult to conceive," he writes, "a grander mass of vegetation: the straight shafts of the timber-tree shooting aloft, some naked and clean, with grey, pale, or brown bark; others literally clothed for yards with a continuous garment of epiphytes, one mass of blossoms, especially the white orchids, which bloom in a profuse manner, whitening their trunks like snow. More bulky trunks were masses of interlacing climbers, enclosing a hollow, once filled by the strangled tree, which had long ago decayed away. From the sides and summit of these, supple branches hung forth, either leafy or naked; the latter resembling cables flung from one tree to another, swinging in the breeze, their rocking motion increased by the weight of great bunches of ferns or orchids, which were perched aloft in the loops. Perpetual moisture nourishes this dripping forest; and pendulous mosses and lichens are met with in profusion."

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

SIR,—As from time to time there have been expressions of interest from various quarters in reference to the rooting of the principle of Free Religion in this (for the most part apathetic or antagonistic) historic place, may I be allowed through your columns to make known a need which possibly certain of your readers may be glad to end, or in part relieve.

A free library has been established in association with our church, and through its direct initiative. Its beginning is necessarily of the smallest dimensions—that is, comparatively to what a library open to all responsible comers should be—but it is the only institution of its kind in the town, and the only place where a student can supply himself with a volume of Emerson, or Martineau, of Ruskin, Carlyle, Ibsen, Whitman, Darwin, Tolstoi, Huxley, or any of the works of such great moderns. It is these men who interest the strongest minds among the younger generation; and by the provision of facilities for their study a magnet is put down which is attracting, and will increasingly attract into sympathy with the movement we represent in Stratford-on-Avon, the more capable and earnest of the young, and their elders who have not lost their elasticity and freshness of mind.

Books and money have already been given by various sympathisers, including, among others, Mrs. Flower, Mr. Hugh Martineau, Sir George and Lady Trevelyan, Professor Carpenter, and Professor Upton. But the undertaking is of some extent, and, as by the kindness of the church committee we are provided with a reading-room, shelves, tables, chairs, &c., and are not justified, in view of their limited treasury and considerable responsibilities, in making any application for further help to them, I venture, on behalf of the library committee, to put its case in the hands of those whose purses are sufficiently deep. £25 would enable us to secure many new publications most necessary to our shelves, and which we urgently need upon them. A very much larger sum could be wisely sunk for the future; for local circumstance has thrust this exceptional opportunity into our hands of making it known that the Church we belong to is one "believing that God's revelation of Himself is continually being made."

The library treasurer is Mr. G. W. Everard, Avonfield, Stratford-on-Avon. I shall be glad to give any further information in regard to the library to any who may be interested. Its regulations are those commonly in operation in free libraries, such modifications as are necessary by our limitations being made. It is fortunate in having the services of Mr. A. H. Wall (late librarian to the Shakespeare Memorial Library here) as librarian, and of Miss Wall as assistant-librarian, who both give generously of their time to it; Mr. Wall himself being in attendance from ten to eight every Thursday and Saturday, when the library is open all day, and always accessible at other times to persons desirous to read in it, or to borrow books from it, his residence being close at hand. I may mention also that half-hour lectures on subjects coming under the heading of "Modern Thought in Relation to Essential Religion" are given weekly, in part-connection with the library, the matters then dealt with leading to reference. At these lectures new people attend. E. B. BETHAM.

P.S.—In connection with the above, we are also instituting a "Junior" or Children's Library, which we look to to become a most valuable adjunct.

DR. MARTINEAU AND UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

SIR,—The Rev. J. E. Odgers, in writing and delivering his interesting and instructive discourse, and you in printing it in full, have placed those who heard and those who will read under a debt of gratitude. Though I was one of the fortunate hearers, I was glad to renew my acquaintance with it in print. I am reluctant to write any word that may have the appearance of finding fault, and yet I cannot help pointing out that there is one statement in it that may be open to question; I allude to the statement: "In his (Dr. Martineau's) sermons he never disputed . . . Look the sermons through, and I think you will not find one that holds the attitude of debate," &c.

This is quite true as a general statement, and perhaps of the whole sermons, but it will not hold good of all the parts. If an orthodox doctrine came in his way, Dr. Martineau was anything but gentle with it. He never shrank from showing his attitude towards it, and that attitude was one of strong opposition. I first notice a few instances that occur to me at the moment.

In "The Limits of Divine and Human Forgiveness" ("Hours of Thought," Vol. ii.) on the text "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us," the opening words are: "Strangely enough, this prayer is daily uttered by those who deny that God can forgive us as we forgive one another; and who say that He requires a penal satisfaction which we never dream of making a condition of our forbearing mercy."

Take another instance from the same volume (p. 294), "The Place of Man in the Scale of Life." We read: "We are often told that our first parents are answerable for the introduction of death into the world, not only of their own descendants, but for all animated nature; so that moral causes would thus extend their agency into the realms of mere physical existence. Geology has long ago refuted the absurdity by exhibiting vestiges of death pervading a vast series of ages before the appearance of man." This looks like quoting "a line of another man's writing for the sake of pulling it to pieces."

Even so far back as the second volume of the "Endeavour," published in 1847, we find something very like disputing. Take this from "The Child's Thought": "In these shrewd days, in which it has become the cleverest thing to suspect the Devil everywhere, and God nowhere, it is thought romantic to believe in the innocence of childhood." . . . "The Church has acted with a cunning theology in this matter; having first spoiled all children with its inanities, and then produced them in court in evidence of original depravity. But if both the world and the Church will only learn what the child's simple presence may teach, instead of teaching what it cannot innocently learn, the truth may dawn upon them that he seldom requires to be led, only not to be misled." That is language strong enough for a Forward Movement lecturer.

In the beautiful sermon, "The Shadow of Death," in the same volume, there is a strong passage against the "rhapsodies of a prevalent fanaticism," with which I will not take up your space.

These passages—and others might be quoted—are sufficient to show that the statement of Mr. Odgers requires some modification. I do not know whether Mr. Odgers would call "the Bible and the Child" a sermon; it certainly has a text, and it is nearly all controversial. That Dr. Martineau's sermons are, on the whole, free from controversy, all who know them must admit; but that in them he "never disputed," is a little bit too sweeping. But when we remember that in his latest book ("Seat of Authority," p. 359), he speaks of full-blown orthodoxy as "this dismal stream of horrors," it is surprising how little controversy found its way into his sermons.

ATHERSTONE—APPEAL.

SIR,—Will you allow me, through your paper, to plead for a little help towards the renovation of our Old Meeting House at Atherstone. It has been closed for some time, owing to its dilapidated condition, with neither pastor, people, or means to restore it. We have now (through the kindness and encouragement of Miss Tagart and Miss Sharpe) great hopes of raising an interest in the old chapel. We have made a debt of £75 for necessary repairs to the structure, and we shall be more than grateful to those who will help us in our difficulties. Once started, we shall do our best to go on and make it self-supporting. We have yet many expenses to meet for the coming winter, in the warming and lighting, but we hope to be in a position by that time to do it. Any contributions will be gratefully acknowledged in THE INQUIRER and the Christian Life by Mrs. Gee, The Grotto; or, the Rev. J. Howard, minister, and

SAMUEL AUSTIN, Secretary.

A MESSAGE FROM ICELAND.

SIR,—I beg leave to tender my warmest thanks to yourself and all my Unitarian friends for all the kindness you have shown me in the past—not to forget your gratuitous sending of your noble paper to my address. But for a severe attack from the influenza that is once more harassing our island, I was hoping to enjoy the pleasure of joining you at your May meeting. Having failed in that hope, I must content myself with once more tendering my love and keen sympathy in your work and aspiration. You scarcely can realise what a privilege and joy it gives me here on the verge of the Polar Sea every month to be able to follow the ideas and utterings of some of England's best and most gifted and heroic men and women. And how sad I feel whenever I notice that some men of your nobility are no more with you. The last and greatest of these was your late Doctor Angelicus et irrefragabilis. How lonely we feel, how poor, how helpless at such a loss! And still we know from experience that spiritual victors never die; neither do their victories terminate with their earthly being, but continue increasing, multiplying ad infinitum. I regret hearing week after week of England's death-struggle with the Boers, most heartily approving your courageous remonstrations against that very questionable policy. But, loathing war and violence, I fully realise how all but impossible it must seem to most Englishmen to stop after such an awful trial before matters are honorably settled—honorably not only for England, but in the eyes of the whole Christian world!

With the Boers qua Boers I feel no special sympathy.

As to liberal Christianity in this country, I may fairly state that it continues spreading all over our land, even our first Church paper becoming more and more liberal, and if we as a Church or community are very much lacking in esprit de corps (owing to our scattered population and other unfortunate circumstances), our people are generally of a decided rational turn of mind, and offer a choice soil to liberal—if not too liberal propaganda. The bigot Danish Inner Mission has no friends here, and fanaticism is felt to be a curse and a nonsense. As I have just resigned my ministry, I shall feel myself more at ease in my endeavour on your noble lines, and am determined to avail myself of every good opportunity as far as my growing age and my scarce material may allow. Please, dear Sir, give the worthy Committee of the B. and F.U.A. my most humble and sincere regards; tell them I should feel exceedingly happy to be favoured with some single copies of your best recent books, as Dr. Martineau's "Essays," his "Study of Religion," by Mr. Armstrong, his last book, "The Seat of Authority," &c.

MATTHIAS JOCHUMSSON.

Akureyri, N. Iceland, May 5.

THE Committee entrusted with the fund raised some time ago for a special "Unitarian Forward Movement" in London have issued their final report. It reminds us that the fund was started in consequence chiefly of attacks made upon Unitarians in connection with the London Board Schools. Originally intended to extend over three years, the "movement" was so liberally financed that the Committee were able to give further aid in two subsequent winters to churches where special courses of sermons were given, and to defray the expenses connected with services held in public buildings. The chief outside work of the kind last winter was at Sydenham, where, under the direction of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, some hopeful results have presented themselves. The total amount given and subscribed was £877 16s. 2d., of which a small balance has been handed over to the London District Association for use in the distribution of literature.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—The Daily Free Press, of 18th inst., says:—The Rev. Alexander Webster delivered the second of his course of lectures at the Broadhill yesterday afternoon. Notwithstanding the inclement state of the weather, there was a very large attendance, a considerable number of boys being, as last Sunday, included amongst the audience. Mr. Webster dealt with the creation and fall, and gave opinions of various scientists on these two points, with a view of showing how the earlier chapters of Genesis should be interpreted. During the lecture there were no disturbances, order being kept by several members of Mr. Webster's congregation. A staff of policemen were also stationed in the vicinity. At the conclusion an attempt was made to follow the rev. gentleman, but he jumped into a cab which was in waiting and drove off immediately.

Antrim: Bi-centennial Service.—Sunday afternoon, June 17, was a bright and happy one for the small congregation of Unitarians here. Nine years ago a great effort was made to transform a very old and crumbling meeting-house into a new one—at least in appearance. A result of the renovation then effected is an unfortunate echo, rendering it difficult, or almost impossible, for the minister to be heard from some parts of the building. Other matters requiring attention were a new harmonium, fresh warming apparatus, and repairs to Manse property and painting the Manse itself; and this year being about the 200th since the meeting-house was built, it was determined to hold a memorial or bi-centennial service, and at the same time again venture to invite the assistance of the public. Unitarian friends came from Larne, Templepatrick, and Crumlin, while well-wishers belonging to other denominations in the town and surrounding districts came trooping in, until the meeting-house was crowded. The Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., of Manchester, was the preacher. After an impressive devotional service, he spoke of theological changes which had taken place since that congregation was established about the middle of the seventeenth century, and said that one of the great faults of some men was to presume that they knew and understood matters known only to God himself. Divergence of opinion was a natural consequence of man's mental and spiritual constitution; but while differing in opinion, all should strive to realise the hand of God in the affairs of men, and to attain the spirit of the Master. Among the personal reminiscences adverted to was one concerning John Wesley, who, in his "Journal," gives a brief account of his visits to Antrim, on two of which he was allowed by the minister of that time to preach in the old Presbyterian meeting-house, which, he says, was "large and commodious." As the Bible in the pulpit lay open he chose for the subject of his discourse the words which first met his eye—namely, "When they had nothing to pay he frankly forgave them both" (Luke vii. 42). This text Mr. Gordon also took as his, in connection with which he briefly referred to different views of the efficacy of Christ's death; a somewhat delicate proceeding in the presence of such a mixed audience gathered for a charitable purpose, but dexterously accomplished; for nothing but sentiments of the highest appreciation have since been heard regarding the discourse. He then referred to a number of distinguished men who had ministered in times past in connection with that congregation—Archibald Ferguson, a young and talented gentleman, who settled in Antrim in 1645, but died early; Thomas Gowan, who established an academy for the training of ministers for Dissenting congregations; John Anderson, who became principal of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrew's; William Adair, son of Patrick Adair, whose work on "Presbyterian Government" forms the substratum of Irish Presbyterian history; and John Abernethy, who had a very extended reputation as a writer, the latter being generally regarded as the first minister of the present meeting-house, which dates from the latter end of the seventeenth century. At the close of the discourse a collection was taken by eight gentlemen, none of whom were Unitarians; £17 had been sent in before the service began by persons, including Roman Catholics, who could not be present, and a further cheque from a well-known Roman Catholic gentleman in the neighbourhood was handed in at the service. The amount thus realised was over £58; but other sums have since been received, and there is still more to come, so that it is concluded the total will eventually reach £64 or £65, a result of the most gratifying character.

Bath.—The annual distribution of prizes in connection with Trim-street Sunday-school took place on Sunday afternoon last. Service was conducted, and the books were given by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, who spoke of the opening of the school on his settlement in the city, twenty years ago, and of the happy and profitable hours spent with a succession of scholars during that period. At the conclusion of the distribution, Misses Vokes and Biss, on behalf of past and present scholars, presented to Mr. and Mrs. Stanley a travelling clock, accompanied by an expression of regret at their departure from Bath, and of hope for their happiness in the new life before them.

Cape Town.—Lieutenant Dear, well known in our South-Eastern churches, has just returned from Africa invalided home. Visiting Ipswich last Sunday, he was invited to take part in the evening service, and in the course of a few remarks, gave a brief account of the church at Cape Town. He said he found a full church, every seat being apparently occupied; the singing was joined in heartily by all the congregation, and the sermon made a deep impression upon him. The coloured people present did not seem to be restricted to a certain portion of the building as they are elsewhere.

Chichester.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last, and the attendances were good. The sermons were preached by the Rev. C. A Hoddinott. The offertory for the annual school treat, Thursday, July 12, was larger than the average of former years.

Clifton.—During the summer months, when ordinary forms of church activity are difficult to keep up, congregational excursions are the order of the day, an attractive programme having been arranged by the Social Union. The most enjoyable of these outings so far was the one on June 9, when a good number of friends visited Oxford, under the minister's guidance, and closed a day devoted to sight-seeing by tea at Manchester College, Dr. Drummond having kindly granted the use of the hall. On June 3 a simple but touching ceremony took place after the morning service, when a resolution was moved by Mr. J. C. Mitchell (the churchwarden), and seconded by Mr. T. Furber, congratulating the esteemed treasurer of the church, Mr. Charles Thomas, J.P., and Mrs. Thomas, on the celebration of their golden wedding, and assuring them of the affectionate regard in which they are held by all their fellow-worshippers. The resolution having been carried, all the members rising in their places, Mr. Thomas, in feeling words, acknowledged the good wishes which had been tendered to his wife and himself, and especially dwelt upon his hopes for Oakfield-road Church, which, he said, was now a living church, and had entered almost upon its brightest days.

Croft.—The annual sermons were preached here last Sunday by the Rev. J. E. Stead, of Park-lane, to good congregations, the congregation in the afternoon being especially large. Large numbers of our friends came in all kinds of conveyances, bicycles being conspicuous, from Warrington, Leigh, Park-lane, and Monton. The weather was very fine. About 170 people took tea between the afternoon and evening services, under a large hay-mow, again kindly placed at our disposal by Farmer Welsby. As on many former occasions, Mr. J. M. Muir, the organist, and the choir of Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington, took charge of the singing. The collection amounted to nearly £10.

Deal.—The committee have undertaken the needful work of the renovation of the ancient chapel, re-opened some years back by the efforts of the Rev. R. Spears. The pews in the centre of the chapel were removed some years ago owing to rottenness, and now the side pews have been taken out, the floors relaid in concrete and wood, the boarding on the walls all renewed, and other repairs are going on. In addition, the roof and walls are being newly coloured, and the whole of the woodwork painted and varnished. New chairs are being provided, and we trust that the result will be to make the chapel much more attractive. The expenses are much heavier than first anticipated, but we are hoping that with a few more donations we shall carry the work through free of debt. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have promised £10. From each of the following £2 have been received:—The Right Hon. J. Chamberlain, Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart, Mrs. A. Lawrence, F. Nettlefold, E. Chitty, Esq., and G. Chitty, Esq.; £1 1s., Mr. E. Gauntlett; £1, Misses Bingham and Gandar, the Rev. T. and Mrs. Shakspeare; 10s., J. T. Preston, Esq., the Misses Addiscott, Miss Wallis, Mr. D. Boyle, Mr. Camburn; 5s., Mrs. H. Chapman, Mrs. Edmondstone, Mrs. Temple: total, £28 6s. The minister, the Rev. T. Shakspeare, Cowper-road, Deal, will be glad to receive and acknowledge in these columns further subscriptions. Last Sunday was called with us "Animals' Sunday," and in each sermon Mr. Shakspeare spoke against the shocking practices of vivisection.

Glasgow.—The Sunday-school annual excursion was held last Saturday, June 16, our destination this year being Kennishead; 120 persons were present. We were favoured with beautiful weather, and spent a very enjoyable afternoon.

Holbeck: Leeds (Appointment).—The Rev. Charles Harry Cook, till recently a Congregationalist minister at Stalbridge, Dorsetshire, has been appointed to the charge of this church. He begins his duties July 1.

Hull.—The Seed Sower, with suitable cover, has been adapted as the monthly magazine for this church. On Tuesday, the 12th, the annual meeting of the congregation was held, and the report then presented was of a satisfactory nature, showing that ground is being gained, and hopes are held out that the church will, at no distant date, develop wider and fuller activity. On Friday, the 15th, the members of the Park-street Literary and Social Union made their annual excursion. The place selected was Flamborough, where all spent a most enjoyable day among the cliffs, and bays, and caves with which this place abounds.

Kingswood (near Birmingham).—The anniversary services in connection with this old country chapel were held on Sunday last, June 17, the preacher being the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Kidderminster, who delivered two excellent sermons to good congregations. Collections amounted to £10 10s.

London: Peckham.—An open-air service in connection with Avondale-road Church was held on Peckham-rye on Monday evening last, conducted by the Rev. G. Carter. The intended distribution of Unitarian tracts had to be abandoned, owing to the absence of a written permit from the County Council for the distribution of literature. This intimation was quietly and courteously conveyed to Mr. Carter without in any way disturbing the meeting.

Saffron Walden.—On Wednesday evening, 13th inst., the Rev. J. A. and Mrs. Brinkworth entertained to tea the members of the congregation who recently took part in making a presentation to their minister in recognition of his twenty-five years' ministry amongst them. After tea Mr. Brinkworth, in a touching speech, thanked them one and all for the thoughtful consideration they had shown towards him. A few of the friends present spoke in appreciative terms of Mr. Brinkworth and his family, and Mr. Gilbey, on behalf of the collectors, testified to the readiness of all before whom the appeal for contributions to the presentation had been brought to join the movement. The evening was further spent in pleasant conversation and the repetition, by request, of the "Dialogue," which was rendered on Good Friday. The proceedings closed with thanks to the Rev. J. A. and Mrs. Brinkworth and the singing of the National Anthem.

Scarborough.—On June 15 a soirée was given as a farewell to the Rev. E. L. H. and Mrs. Thomas. Tea was served at 6.30, and at eight o'clock, when a large number of friends had assembled, a presentation was made on behalf of the congregation by the chairman, Mr. Bailey, consisting of a handsome walnut cabinet, specially designed to hold sermons, a chimney clock with chimes, and a music cabinet for Mrs. Thomas. Mr. Bailey expressed the general and deep regret at the loss of the minister and his wife, grateful recognition of their work and influence during more than six years, and best wishes for their future welfare. Mr. A. C. Williams spoke of the pleasure he had taken in arranging the testimonial, and the hearty goodwill of a great many friends which it represented. After short speeches by Mr. H. J. Morton, J.P., Mr Kettle, who presented a framed etching, his own work, and Mr. Withall, a nonogenarian member, Mr. Thomas responded, expressing the real pleasure with which he and his wife received the beautiful gifts, and realised how many friendships they had made in Scarborough. He alluded to the recent presentation made to him in connection with his work for the R.S.P.C.A., and said that the last few months had brought a revelation of kindly feeling towards them, within and without the church, which could but deepen their regret in leaving, though it was most gratifying as a proof that they had at least tried to do their work well. The meeting was brought to a close by the singing of the National Anthem. Mr. Thomas commences his ministry at Styal and Dean-row on July 1. During July the service here will be conducted by the Rev. J. M. Connell. On Saturday the annual excursion of the Sunday-school took place. The weather being beautiful, many friends joined the party, and a very pleasant afternoon was spent at Brompton.

Sheffield.—A united gathering of the Upper Chapel and Upperthorpe Chapel branches of the Young People's Religious Union was held on June 14 at Upperthorpe. About fifty members and friends attended. The Rev. John Ellis presided and the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A., of Chesterfield, gave a very earnest address on "Christian Discipleship." In the course of his remarks Mr. Bennett gave a beautiful exposition of the words of Jesus to his disciples—"Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." He said there were some things that men chose for themselves, but there were other things that inevitably chose men, and among these was the Gospel of Jesus. Its power was irresistible. Men were born into it. It laid hold on them, and in that way chose them. But Christian discipleship implied more than that. It involved the exercise of the will. It was not an easy thing to be a disciple of Jesus. The early Christians had been called upon to testify with their blood. Though this was no longer necessary, there were still difficulties to be met, temptations to be overcome, and to retain a gentle and cheerful spirit through it all was often a terrible struggle. But there was something more than pain and sorrow. Christ had given man some insight into the power and presence of the Holy Spirit. He had enabled man to feel that he was not alone in the world; that the Holy Spirit was with him, sustaining and cheering him. He concluded by urging his hearers not to confide too much in their own little strength, but to rely upon the spirit of God. A brief discussion followed, in which the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., took part, after which, with the appropriate Liturgy of the Union, a very helpful and stimulating meeting was brought to a close.

Swansea.—On Wednesday evening, June 13, an interesting presentation was made to Miss Lilian Hutton, on the occasion of her marriage with Mr. G. H. Bell, eldest son of Mr. George Bell, Town Surveyor. Mrs. Bell had been a faithful Sunday-school teacher, and the presentation took the form of a portrait of herself and class, together with two beautifully bound volumes—Shakespeare's works and "Annandale's English Dictionary." The presentations were made by Mrs. Tudor Jones and Miss Rosser. The minister, Messrs. C. H. Perkins, D. Harris, J. Burchell, J. J. Guppy, together with several ladies took part in the meeting. Mr. W. H. Jones gave an appropriate recitation. The meeting wished the young couple a happy future, and hoped that they will follow the example of their worthy parents in their faithfulness to the cause of Unitarian Christianity.

MR. P. C. MOZOOMDAR, who has been in America attending the Unitarian meetings at Boston, was to sail from New York, on June 20 for Liverpool, and intends to remain in this country until the autumn. Mr. Mozoomdar will be glad to make engagements to preach and speak wherever desired, and communications may be addressed to him for the present at Essex Hall. We understand that Mr. Mozoomdar is expected to preach to-morrow (Sunday) at one of the services at Hope-street Church, Liverpool.

As we receive successive numbers of the Christian Register, beginning with that of May 31, we realise more and more fully how rich in interest and inspiration were the anniversary meetings of the American Unitarian Association in Boston, which some of our friends were privileged to attend. Mr. Bowie is giving us his own impressions of the meetings, and this week and last we have quoted some of the most striking of the utterances. At the Unitarian Festival on May 24 Mr. Bowie was one of the speakers, as also at the annual meeting two days before. At the Festival meeting he spoke, among other things, of the great impression the public school system in Boston had made upon him, and having referred to the problems of thought and life which must tax the mind and heart, and search the conscience of those who will be in the religious vanguard of the future, he added:—

No one can be brought into close touch with the ordinary thought and feeling of our time without being forced to recognise that our old controversies that interested us in days gone by have lost their interest for the world to-day, but that new problems of thought, and especially new problems of life, are forcing themselves upon us and demanding a solution. It would be a thousand pities if the Unitarians of America and England, the Unitarians and liberal thinkers and workers the wide world over, left those problems untouched by their thought, and especially by the sanity, if I may call it so, and the soberness of their judgment and their feeling.

And in conclusion, he spoke of the great interest he had found in his visit to America:—

I have rejoiced to look into the faces of men and women whose faces do not seem very different from those I see in my own country, and to feel that the cause of liberal religion is in their hands. Let us realise the gravity and the responsibility of the trust that has been placed upon us. We are Unitarians, not because any priest tells us, nor any book. We are Unitarians, I take it, simply because Unitarianism is a convenient name and stands for the highest truth we know, for the noblest and holiest sympathies and aspirations that have come to us, and because Unitarianism leaves the door open for any larger vision of truth or goodness that the present or the future may have in store for us.

At the earlier meeting Mr. Bowie delivered the greetings of English Unitarians to their American brethren, and, having spoken of our great indebtedness to American teachers, made the following allusion to what England had given to them:—

You have placed the name of James Martineau among the rest of the heroes of your faith. I wish, as an old student of his, I could convey to you the sweet tones of his beautiful voice, or present to you a picture of his noble and saintly presence. He, too, is loved in America as your great teachers are loved in England. We feel that we are joined together in the bonds of a common faith and a common hope and a common sympathy. We have placed upon us, as I believe, by the mercy of God, a great and a solemn responsibility—this great English-speaking race, scattered over the face of the earth—an immense responsibility and a solemn trust. I am glad that in America, as I have gone about from place to place, I find men and women who speak the common language of Shakespeare and Milton, men and women who are inspired by the same great ideals of faith and duty, who are working out the great problems of thought and life and bringing this larger faith and hope into contact with the workday life of the world. I am glad to be here; I do not feel as if I were a foreigner or a stranger, but as if I were among my brothers and my sisters.

THE Report of the Committee on Public Questions, presented to the recent meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, opened with the following passages, dealing with the war in South Africa:—

"The Committee find it impossible to pass over, without notice, the war in South Africa. It is the all-engrossing subject of the day; and a Report, on 'great questions, in which the moral and religious principles that the Assembly has at heart, are at stake,' which should leave the war outside its cognisance, would be lame and impotent. Never in the Assembly's history was there a question which touched these moral and religious principles more closely. It is in such a crisis that the Christianity of the nation is on its trial, and that all who can influence its life and thought are called upon to raise their voice in the cause of national righteousness. It would be quite out of place in such a report as this to enter into any detailed discussion of the issues involved in the War; but there are principles at stake which admit of broad and dispassionate statement, and which go to the very root of the national life. The ancient traditions of this Assembly have placed it in the vanguard of those who have fought the battle of justice and liberty, not only for individuals but for nations. This is the sacred cause at issue to-day. The nineteenth century of the Christian era is closing with much to discourage those who, in the middle of it, had dreams of peace, retrenchment and reform, and of a coming time of goodwill among men. In this country, foremost among the Christian nations of the world in the march of human progress and freedom, there is witnessed a new-birth of the military spirit, and a new outburst of imperialism, under the influence of the lamentable war in which its people are engaged. From peaceful measures and peaceful interests the minds of men, and especially of the rising generations, are diverted to battles and sieges and military glory.

"The young people now growing up are carried away by this spirit; calm reason, and consideration for the rights and liberties of others, are in danger; national aggrandisement, and the subjection of race by race, and the waving of battle flags loom larger and larger on the horizon. There are things for which, and there are things against which it may be a Christian duty to fight. There are causes in which it may be an act of Christian heroism to die; but this nation is called at this crisis of its destinies to ask itself solemnly what it is fighting for. If the bloodshed and the suffering and the misery of war continue one unnecessary hour, great is the burden that falls upon the national conscience; and if the battle is for any but a righteous cause there is not glory but dishonour and shame in it. No matter how mighty the strength put forth, no matter how brilliant the victories won; if the cause be not that of human right, every blow struck only adds to the evil committed. The cause is everything; and this ancient Assembly, descended from a past full of noble sacrifices for liberty, should let its voice be heard for the precious boon of human freedom for Boer as for Briton, and for the brotherhood of the two, race supremacy on either side unknown.

"In so far as in the past in the Transvaal Briton may have been in subjection to Boer, it was a wrong, terribly avenged; if out of this war should arise a future in which Boer may be in subjection to Briton, the wrong will be as great; and it will be much if the reckoning be not as severe. Absolute liberty and perfect equality for Briton and Boer should be the one vital condition of the coming peace; and the aim of all Christian men and women should be to secure its blessings with the least delay. One of the lamentable incidents in this terrible time, for those who love the fair fame of England, has been the terrorism which has made public discussion almost impossible; but if anywhere the plea should be raised for peace and goodwill among men, if anywhere with no uncertain voice the rampant war spirit should be rebuked, and the gospel of human brotherhood—knowing no race divisions—be preached, it is in such an Assembly as this, with its fine traditions of justice and liberty; if anywhere war should be denounced as the greatest of earthly crimes, unless waged for a noble cause, and in defence of human liberties and rights, it is here."

REV. J. POLLARD'S WORK AT RHYL-STREET—AN APPEAL.

SIR,—It will be known to some of your readers that, after nearly twenty years of devoted and arduous service as Missionary to the Poor, the Rev. J. Pollard has terminated his ministry at Rhyl-street. He has been at the head of the Mission Station there since its foundation in 1882, and, owing to his untiring labours and sympathetic interest in the life of the people of the district, a strong and healthy centre of Christian work has been created, which we trust may long continue to exert its influence for good in the thickly populated neighbourhood. The Committee of the London Domestic Mission Society feel that they cannot allow Mr. Pollard to sever his connection with them without some tribute of their appreciation and indebtedness. They are desirous, as a slight token of their esteem, to purchase for Mr. Pollard a life annuity, and they cannot but think that many of your readers will be pleased to have an opportunity of joining with them in the raising of a fund for this purpose. As representing the Committee, we trust we may trespass upon your space to make their intention known, and to state that contributions towards the object mentioned will be thankfully received by the treasurer of the society, Mr. Philip Roscoe, 28, Denning-road, Hampstead, N.W.

P. M. MARTINEAU, chairman of Committee.
PHILIP ROSCOE, treasurer.

HOLIDAY HOME

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to draw the attention of your readers to the advertisement which appears in another column of the opening of the above? May I also take the opportunity of acknowledging the kind gifts of your readers in response to my recent appeal? Towards the purchase of a piano the following subscriptions were received—namely, Mrs. Kitson, Leeds, £2; Mr. H. J. Morton, Scarboro', £1 1s.; Mrs. Hicks, Buxton, 10s. A parcel of curtains was also received from Miss Jameson, Manchester, and a large carpet from the Moss-side Sunday School. In addition to the above I have received the very kind offer of Mrs. Jevons, of Pinner, to send us a piano carriage paid. While gratefully accepting the above I am also venturing to use the subscriptions to complete the necessary purchases of carpets, blinds, &c. CHARLES PEACH.

GEORGE'S-ROW MISSION.

SIR,—As death has unfortunately made gaps in the ranks of usual subscribers, will you please allow me to appeal to friends for help for the Convalescent and Excursion Funds? Both agencies are of great importance in our poor and insanitary parish, which in several areas has lately been utterly condemned by the London County Council. As to poverty, some years ago Mr. Charles Booth pointed the district out on his map as one of the poorest in London. It is considerably worse now. And within the last few days even, important statistics have been published which show that in St. Luke's, E.C., the death-rate in phthisis or consumption is the highest of any parish in London. Hence, surely, is the absolute necessity of striving to afford individuals and poor families a needed help of rest and change. Subscriptions may be sent to me at the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C., or to 4, Durley-road, Stamford Hill, N., and will be most gratefully received.

FREDERICK SUMMERS.

THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS IN DARJEELING.—The Darjeeling Standard of May 31 contains the following:—"Large numbers of the Darjeeling public have been both delighted and edified by the two lectures given by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams in the Hindu Public Hall, Darjeeling, in connection with the Darjeeling Association. On the first occasion, Thursday evening, May 24, Mr. Williams delivered a thoughtful and eloquent address on 'Man's Origin, Nature, and Destiny,' to a very large audience, the hall being full. On the second occasion, Sunday evening, the 29th, the reverend gentleman delivered a suggestive and impassioned lecture, full of intellectual power and moral fervour, on 'The Transient Forms and the Eternal Essence of Religion.' Notwithstanding the inclement weather there was an excellent audience. On both occasions the lecturer was heartily thanked for his valuable addresses."

THE official report of the proceedings of the National Conference at Leicester has now been published, and may be had at Essex Hall for a shilling. The Report, which makes a book of 194 pages, is a complete record of the proceedings, all the papers except Mrs. Humphry Ward's, and including Mr. Stopford Brooke's address on Dr. Martineau, being given in full. The various discussions are also fully reported, and the complete text of the present constitution of the Conference, with the roll of churches is included. The book is therefore a most interesting and valuable record.

THE UNITARIAN METHODISTS.—II.

(B.) ORGANISATION. (C.) LATER HISTORY.

THE Unitarian Methodists for a time retained a distinctive organisation. A regular "Preacher's and Prayer Leader's Plan" was drawn up each half-year. The plans for the last six months of 1816 and the first six months of 1817 are appended to John Ashworth's account of these societies. The preaching stations for 1817 were Rochdale, Newchurch, Padiham, Burnley, Bury, Oldham, with Whitworth, Lanehead, and Lowerplace, the last three being connected with Rochdale, and there were thirteen local preachers. They also continued the class meetings. In the list of chapels published in "The Manchester Socinian Controversy" 1825, the following account of the movement is given :—

After Mr. Cooke's death many of his hearers having embraced Unitarian sentiments formed themselves into a distinct society, retaining part of the plans common to the Wesleyans, but differing very far from them in doctrine. A yearly meeting of the brethren is held at some appointed place, in imitation of the Methodist Conference, at which a plan is drawn up appointing the preachers to their different stations for the ensuing year. They have several licensed rooms in Lancashire, mostly in the neighbourhood of Rochdale and Manchester . . . in which they have Sunday-schools and preaching.

Through one of the ministers of this society being invited to preach at Elland in Yorkshire a few times, they became known to Dr. Thomson, of Halifax, who introduced them to the notice of the Unitarian public, and was instrumental in getting them financial help, needed for the erection of their chapels, for the people were poor, being chiefly hand-loom weavers. The ministry was almost entirely voluntary. The work of John Ashworth at Newchurch for upwards of forty years, that of James Pollard and John Robinson at Padiham for a like period, and that of James Taylor and James Wilkinson at Rochdale, cannot be too highly praised. For nearly half a century these congregations were not only kept together but grew in numbers and influence under the devoted ministry of these laymen.

At Todmorden, in 1815, there was a secession from the Methodists of those who were in sympathy with the teachings for which Mr. Cooke had been expelled. These folk formed the nucleus of the present Unitarian Church in Todmorden. They invited the Rev. Richard Wright, the Unitarian missionary, to visit them in 1818. In 1823 it was resolved at the Unitarian Meeting Room :—"That we form ourselves into a Society to be denominated the 'The Todmorden Unitarian Society,' for the purpose of purchasing ground and erecting a building thereupon, to be called the Unitarian Meeting Home, wherein religious worship of one God in one Person shall be carried on, and a school be taught."

The congregation at Oldham was for many years affiliated with the Unitarian Methodist Association; and the declining Unitarian congregation at Rawtenstall was re-invigorated by an accession of local followers of Joseph Cooke.

The Manchester Unitarian Village Missionary Society (1824) rendered signal service to the cause in North East Lancashire by occasionally sending their missionaries to visit those parts. For example, the Rev. R. Shenton was sent by them to the Padiham district for a fortnight in the summer of 1833. During his visit he preached at Padiham six times, at Cheapside twice, and once each at Accrington and Rawtenstall. In 1828 the Rev. G. Buckland visited them more than once; in June of that year he was accompanied by the Rev. J. R. Beard, who preached twice at Padiham, and once in the open air at Downham, near Clitheroe.

There is still scope for similar missionary activity in the district, and the existing congregations, vigorous as they are, might be strengthened if cottage services could be arranged in the villages that surround them.

Joseph Barker and the Christian Brethren.

In addition to the congregations already mentioned there are a few others that owe their origin to a different and later secession from the Methodists, not this time from the Wesleyan Methodists, but from the Methodist New Connexion, itself a split (1797) from the older Methodism led by Alexander Kilham in the interests of freedom and the rights of the laity. The little volume commemorating the jubilee of the Methodist New Connexion refers to the matter rather lightly in these terms :—"The Conference of 1841 expelled a person from our ministry for unsoundness in doctrine who had come amongst us from the Wesleyans, and who has since made himself notorious by impudent eccentricities and the advocacy of low Socinianism." The great popularity of this unnamed person is admitted, and the account continues :—"Numbers in various circuits were incited to leave us, most of whom have since discovered with shame and regret that they left the Light of Truth to follow the glare of a wandering star."* The person here referred to was Joseph Barker (1806-1875), a man of great power and restless energy, born of a Wesleyan family at Bramley, near Leeds. The extent to which his expulsion affected the Methodist New Connexion will be understood when it is borne in mind that the official records show a reduction in the number of local preachers the year after Barker was expelled from 873 to 755, and in church members from 22,008 to 19,884. If he had been possessed of more organising power and more stability he might have established many strong congregations. He and his followers were ardent reformers, and invested the question of reform with a fine religious fervour. He laboured to provide the working folk with cheap and good literature, and was helped in this work by the Unitarians, who provided him with a printing press. In so far as he sought to organise religious societies at all it was upon a simple Christian basis.

In 1844 he began to publish a little periodical called The Christian, and we get an insight into his views on this point, at that particular time, from the opening article. He there defines a Christian as "one who believes that Jesus is the Christ, the Messiah, and who, under the influence of such faith, places himself under Christ's instruction and government"; and a Christian Church as "a number of persons joined together on the simple ground of faith in Jesus as the Christ, a faith working by love." Having thus set forth his idea of the essential opinion qualifying anyone for admission as a member of a Christian Church, he proceeds with characteristic inconsequence: "A Church founded on the principle of agreement in opinion is not a Christian Church. It may have Christians in it, but it is not a Christian Church. A Church founded on the principle of agreement in opinion with John Wesley is a Wesleyan Church; a Church founded on the principle of agreement in opinion with Martin Luther is a Lutheran Church; a Church founded on the principle of agreement in the opinion that water baptism is a Christian institution is a Baptist Church—but none of them are Christian Churches." The friends of evangelical reform were gathered into churches or societies "on the broad gospel, anti-sectarian principle" at Newcastle, South Shields, High Felling, Shotley Bridge, Ebchester, Hexham, Stockton, West Auckland, Ingleton, Barnard Castle, and many parts of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the Pottery district of Staffordshire. The members were known as "Christian Brethren." "I want a name," said Barker, "that points out or declares my faith, my hope, my character—a name that means faith in Christ, and hope of eternal glory, and love to God and all the human family. Christian or disciple of Christ does mean all this, and it means no more; and I therefore cling to this name, and reject all others. Christian, or disciple of Christ, says nothing about opinions or ceremonies; it signifies no theological system, no theory of interpretation." In another article of the same year (1844), he says: "If I cannot have the privileges of Church fellowship with my brethren, without a belief or a profession of belief, in the great principles of what is called orthodox theology, I must live and die without those privileges. . . . If I cannot enjoy the privileges of Church fellowship, with the understanding that I not only utterly disbelieve the great principles of the prevailing theology, but that I consider myself bound in duty to God and to mankind, to labour for their utter overthrow, I must be content to stand alone."

At this period Mr. Barker was continually preaching and lecturing in different parts of the country, and he usually found the Unitarians willing to set their places of worship and their schoolrooms at his disposal. So far as I know, few or none of the religious societies, organised as a result of Barker's work, have had a continuous existence, except those which frankly threw in their lot with the Unitarian body, like Mossley, Mottram in Longdendale, and Barnard Castle, yet his followers could be counted by thousands. This may be due to the fact that Mr. Barker had entirely changed his views on the subject of Church organisation by the autumn of 1847. One of the Churches of Christian Brethren which put this question to intending members, "Do you believe in Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God?" was in doubt as to whether it might admit to membership one who only believed "in God and the book of nature." They applied to Barker for advice. In his reply, dated Sept. 29, 1847, he say: "I have myself lost all faith in church organisation. I have no connection with any Church at present, nor do I ever intend to have. I have ceased to form

* "The Jubilee of the Methodist New Connexion," 1848, p. 361.

Churches. My only business is, to try to promote the improvement and welfare of all my fellow-creatures whether they be Infidels, Jews, or Christians, and to regulate my intercourse with them all by a simple regard to their interests and to the interests of mankind at large. The whole system of forming Churches, of receiving and expelling members, appears to me to be wrong." In 1851 Joseph Barker emigrated to America; in 1860 he returned. He passed through a phase of scepticism, lecturing during 1862 to a congregation "of an eclectic kind of unbelievers at Burnley"; he then reverted to modified orthodoxy, and became a local preacher amongst the Primitive Methodists, remaining with them till 1868, when he again left for America where he had secured a valuable property. There he died in 1875.

The movement thus originated by Joseph Barker in 1841, and that started by Joseph Cooke in 1806, were the only movements of any extent from Methodism in the direction of Unitarianism during the century. Numbers were cheered and helped thereby, and numbers gained, by means of the fresh light that was thus poured in upon their minds, that peace which the world was powerless to take away.

NOTE. — The following extraordinary handbill, posted in several villages of Wensley-dale in 1844, will indicate the kind of persecution to which these people were subjected:—

"Lord Bolton having been informed that a person of the name of Barker has been holding forth strange opinions of a blasphemous and dangerous tendency, and that he has not only been listened to and harboured by some of his Lordship's tenants, but that they have become his avowed converts, some of whom having publicly explained and advocated his principles on the Sabbath and other days, his Lordship has directed me to make it known to his tenants how much he is dissatisfied with their conduct, but trusts they will be enabled to see their folly and the danger they are exposing themselves to.—(Signed) WM. SADDLER, Agent for Lord Bolton."

W. H. BURGESS.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE annual meetings of the Union were held at the Chapel Lane Chapel, Bradford, on Wednesday, June 20.

In the morning the Rev. J. C. Odgers, of Bury, preached from the text "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him" (1 John iii. 16). The preacher referred to the recent celebration of the centenary of the death of the poet William Cowper at Olney, and commented on the theological views of the Low Church party, to which Cowper belonged, his entire unselfishness of character, his readiness to diminish sorrow and suffering, but his agonised fear at the possible loss of his own soul. Cowper believed most ardently in all the doctrines which were declared at the time to be necessary for salvation, but he was never able to satisfy himself that his belief was deep enough or correct enough, and the inward assurance of salvation was never experienced by him. He died in utter despair. Insanity affected his last years, and it was probable that the dark Calvinism which he so sacredly held contributed largely to his despondency. In opposition to such a form of faith there had been taught during the last hundred years, both in England and America, the gospel of the Fatherhood of God, and His free, unpurchased love, by many teachers from Dr. Priestley to Dr. Martineau, who were in the forefront of Unitarian Christians. It was largely owing to the force and ability of their preaching in the past that the belief in eternal torments had gradually disappeared in almost all the churches of Christendom, which, however, had not yet comprehended the full mercy of the Infinite Father. The doctrine of Divine love as taught by Unitarian Christians, and held by them to be the essence of the teaching of Jesus, was still needed in all human troubles and sorrows, and in all dealings of man with man.

BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held in the Channing Hall in the afternoon. The Rev. A. CHALMERS, of Wakefield, the retiring President, occupied the chair, and he was supported by Mr. Charles W. Jones (Liverpool), the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, J. E. Manning, J. Ellis, J. Fox, Mr. E. Basil Lupton, hon. secretary, Mr. F. R. Pesel, and Mr. Byron Boothroyd.

The annual report recorded steady work and progress during the year. It included short reports on the mission work of the Union at Dewsbury, Doncaster, Elland, Huddersfield, Lydgate, Malton, Pepper Hill, Pudsey, and Selby. The balance-sheet showed an income of £363 13s. 1d., including subscriptions £130 1s. 9d., whilst the expenditure, which nearly all consisted of grants, amounted to £350 10s. 1d., and the year, which began with a balance in hand of £41 19s. 6d., closed with a credit balance of £55 2s. 6d.

Miss ALICE LUCAS, in presenting the annual report of the Yorkshire Unitarian Postal Mission, regretted that a larger amount of work had not been accomplished. This failure had arisen from two causes—the ill-health of one of the secretaries, and the diversion of attention from theological inquiry to the war. In response to the advertisements which had been issued, sixty-two correspondents had applied to the secretaries for literature. These included five rectors or vicars in the Church of England, three ministers of other bodies, and one Roman Catholic. The committee would feel more satisfied with the work of the mission if a larger number of applicants for the literature of liberal thought could be induced to ask more repeatedly for loans of books. Only five new correspondents had taken advantage of the offer of loans, a smaller proportion of the whole than last year.

The CHAIRMAN proposed that the reports be adopted and that the officers for the ensuing year be elected as follows:—President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot; vice-presidents, Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, and A. Chalmers; treasurer, Mr. F. R. Pesel; general secretary, Mr. E. Basil Lupton; supply secretary, Rev. John Ellis; auditor, Mr. Edward Bramley, Sheffield; Postal Mission secretaries, Miss Clara Lucas and Miss Alice Lucas, Harrogate.

In glancing through the reports from the various assisted churches, the Chairman observed that Dewsbury was in a rather bad way. If he might so term it, the congregation there had had persistent bad luck for a number of years, and he could only hope that better times were coming shortly. The Malton Church was also in a poor way, but in other places the assisted churches were on the whole progressing satisfactorily. In regard to the finances of the Union, a considerable improvement was desirable, and, indeed, absolutely necessary if the work was to be carried on as it ought to be. Four or five large and strong churches had not sent quite as much as they might have been expected to do in the form of collections. The Bradford church, however, had had to deal with a large burden of their own during the past year. An effort would have to be made to improve the financial condition of the Union, and if they could not raise money by any other means, the committee were going to appeal to the ladies to promote a bazaar. He had been connected with the Union for twenty years, and he could say that if it had not been for that organisation, Unitarianism would have been in a much worse position in Yorkshire to-day than it was.

Mr. CLAYTON (Leeds), in seconding the resolution, thought that the position gave no cause for depression. Most of the assisted churches were going on well. But Unitarians generally were far from being sufficiently aggressive. If more life were infused into the work of the Union, far greater progress would be made. There were many places such as Barnsley, Pontefract, Keighley, and Bingley, where the cause was entirely unrepresented, and more energy and enthusiasm on the part of the committee of the Union was wanted.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS and Mr. C. W. JONES supported the resolution, which was agreed to. Mr. Ellis remarked that the work of the Unitarian churches in all the large centres of population in Yorkshire—which did not come within the scope of the report of the Union—was as vigorous as it ever had been during his recollection.

Votes of thanks were passed to Mr. Odgers for the sermon preached in the morning, and to the lay-preachers of the Union for their services during the year, the latter resolution being acknowledged by Mr. C. Stainer. The meeting also decided to convey an expression of welcome to the Rev. H. Rawlings, of York (who was not able to be present), on his return to ministerial work in Yorkshire.

On the motion of the Rev. J. Fox, the secretary was instructed to send a letter of condolence to Mr. J. Pickles, who has been a lay-preacher for fifty years, on the death of his wife.

PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Channing Hall. Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT presided over a large audience. The new President, in his inaugural address, referred to the prominent Unitarian thinkers of the century, especially to Dr. Martineau, whose works, he said, had benefited mankind generally. Unitarians did not claim that they were the only ones to free religion, but they did claim that they were the first to apply the new doctrine of searching for truth wherever it could be found—a doctrine which had allowed learned men to interpret the Scriptures in the only way in which they could be interpreted. They believed that to a large extent they had found the truth—at all events they were searching for the truth, and above all they were not afraid of what the truth might be. They had put the whole of their religion into the melting-pot, but they had got rid of nothing except the dross, and the gold remained as pure as it was before. They had got rid of a good deal of the mysticism and mystery. They believed that the purer they made their faith the nearer they would get to the faith which Christ himself taught and handed down to his disciples.

The Rev. A. CHALMERS proposed a resolution welcoming Mr. C. W. Jones, of Liverpool, ex-president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and thanking that body for the help they had given to the Union. The motion was seconded by the Rev. J. E. Manning, and was carried with applause.

Mr. JONES, in replying, spoke of the need of a greater sincerity in religion. There was an awful feeling of insincerity in religious matters throughout the whole of the country, and this was a much more serious matter than the ritualistic practices which had aroused so much discussion. The only gospel that the Unitarian Church would have to preach far into the new century was that sincerity in religion was of much greater importance than correctness of belief.

The Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES proposed a resolution expressing appreciation of the splendid services which had been rendered to the cause of liberal religion by the Yorkshire Unitarian Union since its formation under another name eighty-five years ago, and pledging the meeting to support any movement that may be inaugurated with the beginning of the twentieth century to improve the financial position of the society, and to bring more prominently before the public the great principles of the Unitarian faith.

In the course of his address, Mr. Ceredig Jones said he thought the wording of the resolution was such that no one who was at all acquainted with the work of the Union during its long history, or with the present needs of their churches could fail to endorse it. As they stood, as it were, on the borderland which divided two centuries, they naturally thought of the work which had been done by their Society in the past, and looked to the future to see what prospects were opening out before them, so that they might be able to take full advantage of their new opportunities. As they reviewed their work during the century which was drawing to a close, his feelings were those of gratitude and satisfaction. It might be news to those present that their Society had been founded at a meeting held at Leeds ten days before the battle of Waterloo. The leading spirits in that movement had been the Rev. Thomas Jervis, of Mill Hill, and the Rev. H. Turner, of Chapel-lane Chapel; and the early death of the latter, at Nottingham, had been the means of inducing their revered leader, Dr. Martineau, to enter the Unitarian ministry. It had been the original object of the Society to furnish its members with suitable literature illustrative of the Unitarian faith, and in that direction it had rendered valuable service.

The Society had also formed a happy bond of union during the whole term of its existence between the churches of the West Riding, and latterly between all the Free Churches in Yorkshire. He used the term Free Churches in its fullest sense, as meaning churches that were not bound down in any way by the dead hand of ancient creeds, but were free to accept all the new light that advancing knowledge might throw on the great problems of life and thought. Although there was not required of them any declaration of assent to this or that dogma, he believed there was far more unanimity amongst them than was to be found in the so-called evangelical bodies, including the Established Church. As Unitarians they were bound together to a very great extent by sympathy of character—by the conviction that a noble life was the most acceptable offering that they could render to their Creator. For eighty-five years they had held together as a group of churches, and that day they clung as tenaciously as ever to the great verities of the Unitarian faith, such as the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men. They could not help being deeply impressed with the value of their work when they thought of the noble men and women that had been associated with their Society. The names of the Bucktons, Luptons, Carbutts, and Kitsons, and those of Charles Wellbeloved, John Kenrick, Nicholas Heineken, William Brown, Daniel Gaskell, William Thomas Marriot, Richard Pilcher, and James Stansfeld, were such as they all might well be proud of. The faith which had inspired such earnest lives must have truth on its side.
